In addition, hundreds of thousands of illegal entrants come into the United States every year. While the total number of illegal aliens in the country is unknown, the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy estimated the figure to be between 3.5 and 6 million for 1978. The number is surely much larger today.

Mr. President, there was a time when the Nation could welcome millions of newcomers without jeopardizing the national interest. Such is not the case today in a complex industrial society with considerable unemployment and a need for specialized skills. This bill—while recognizing the great benefits this country obtains from new migrants—tries to come to grips with the necessity that they be limited to an appropriate number, and be selected within that number based on family reunification priorities and preferences for skills needed in a highly developed country. This necessitates that illegal entrants into the United States be brought under control.

The pending measure takes a number of different approaches to reform the immigration laws. First, the bill contains provisions to increase control over illegal immigration. The primary incentive for illegal immigration is the availability of U.S. employment. This bill makes unlawful the knowing employment, or the recruitment or referral for a fee, of illegal aliens. It also provides for a system to verify work eligibility and establishes substantial civil penalties for violations.

Should a pattern or practice of violations subsequent to the imposition of a penalty for a prior pattern or practice of violations be found, then a criminal penalty may be imposed. The bill also established new crimes for certain activities involving fraudulent documents and for bringing illegal aliens to the United States. It further states the sense of the Congress that the resources for border patrol and other enforcement activities should be increased. For this purpose, $840 million for fiscal year 1987, and $830 million for fiscal year 1988, are authorized for the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Second, certain improvements are directed at nonimmigrant categories. The bill provides for a special, streamlined procedure for H-2 seasonal workers based on the compromise reached by the conference committee in the last Congress. In addition, a 3-year agricultural transition program is provided to enable agricultural employers to adjust gradually to the new system. The bill also establishes a 12-member Agricultural Workers Commission to report within 2 years to Congress with specific legislative recommendations regarding the appropriate form of U.S. temporary worker programs. Further, special immigration benefits are provided for certain children and the surviving spouse of an employee of an international organization and retired employees of such organizations who have been in the United States many years. A pilot visa waiver program is authorized for up to eight countries with low rates of visa denial and exclusion.

Third, the bill provides for a one-time legalization program to deal with the large group of illegal aliens in this country who have been here long enough to have built up certain equities. A Presidentially appointed Legalization Commission, composed of nine members committed to the concept of legalization, is established to determine that enforcement mechanisms are in place to curtail illegal immigration. Legalization procedures are then triggered.

Regardless, legalization will begin no later than 3 years after enactment of this legislation. Once legalization is begun, certain illegal aliens who physically have been present in the United States since the date of enactment, and have continuously resided in the United States since before January 1, 1980, may apply for legal temporary resident status. Such persons may adjust to permanent resident status after 3 years from the date they are granted temporary residence, if they satisfy a minimum English language requirement and have a minimum knowledge of U.S. history and Government, or are enrolled in a program to acquire such knowledge. Such temporary residents will not be eligible for Federal financial benefits. The bill provides for Federal payment to States of up to $600 million per year, for 3 years, in the form of a capped entitlement program, to reimburse them for any necessary public assistance which they are required to provide to these residents.

Mr. President, this triggered approach is a change from the earlier versions of this legislation, and one which I find easier to support. I still do not condone the entry of these illegal aliens into our country. If I did not believe that the only way the Federal Government can gain control over immigration and refugee policy is by way of a legalization program, I would be opposed to it. By delaying the program until after effective enforcement provisions are in place, we will ensure that further illegal immigration will be discouraged.

Finally, the bill requires certain reports from the President to the Congress with respect to the employer sanctions, provisions, legal and illegal immigration, the verification procedures and the legalization program. To ensure that a pattern of discrimination against eligible workers seeking employment does not develop, the General Accounting Office is to monitor the implementation of employer sanctions. This report is to be reviewed by the Attorney General, jointly with the Chairmen of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Commission on Civil Rights. If such a pattern of discrimination has resulted, specific remedial legislative proposals are to be recommended to Congress.

Mr. President, this is an important bill that should be enacted as quickly as possible. It will not solve all of our problems relating to immigration and refugees, but it is a major step in the right direction. I hope that the Senate will approve this bill expeditiously.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACT CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, it has been nearly 2 months since a state of emergency was declared in South Africa. During that time, more than 2,300 South Africans, most of them peaceful, black anti-apartheid protesters, have been detained and over 100 blacks have been killed in clashes with the police and security forces. In an effort to stamp out the growing anti-apartheid movement, the South African Government has arrested leaders of the United Democratic Front, made acts of civil disobedience such as boycotts criminal offenses, outlawed various forms of freedom of assembly and speech, and placed restrictions on funeral proceedings, one of the few remaining outlets of political expression for blacks.

South African President P.W. Botha has belied his commitment to "reform" by refusing to meet unconditionally with respected black leaders such as Nobel laureate Bishop Desmond Tutu and by failing to announce concrete steps toward ending apartheid in his recent speech before the Natal Congress of the Nationalist Party. Botha's hard line and the excessive and wanton use of force by the government has only served to increase the anger and frustration of South African blacks and to breed more violence and unrest throughout the country. South Africa will continue to be a tinderbox until the racist, white minority government abandons its brutal use of force and sits down with black leaders chosen freely by the black community to negotiate the dismantling of apartheid.

Given the seriousness of the South African situation and the widespread opposition among South African blacks and the American people to the administration's failed policy of "constructive engagement," I believe that the Senate should vote on the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985. This legislation would provide scholarships and other forms of assistance to blacks, make the Sullivan principles mandatory for United States firms in South Africa, prohibit the importation of Krugerrands, ban loans to the South African Government, halt computer sales to South African Government agencies enforcing or administering apartheid, and cut off nuclear trade. It also holds out the threat of future sanctions by requiring the President to report to the Congress in 12 months on what, if any, progress has been made in ending apartheid.

On Monday, the President signed an Executive order embodying many of the provisions in the conference report. However, there are important differences between the two. Whereas the report would ban the importation of Krugerrands immediately, the order defers the ban until after the administration has consulted with the parties to GATT—a process that could take years and never result in a ban. The provisions on loans, computer sales, and nuclear trade in the order are significantly weaker than those in the conference report. Finally, the President's order does not hold out the threat of future sanctions, thereby removing an instrument of pressure on the South African Government.

The President's order is a step in the right direction, but it is too little too late. As Bishop Tutu has stated, it is "not even a flea bite." A recent poll conducted for the London Times by a South African affilitate of the Gallup organization indicates that 77 percent of South African blacks favor economic sanctions. In view of this it is clear that the President's order, which was accompanied by a reaffirmation of his commitment to the policy of constructive engagement, will not convince South African blacks that there will be a real change in United States policy.

Under these circumstances, it is more important than ever for the Senate to follow the House and pass the conference report on the Anti-Apartheid Action Act. I regret that the Senate failed to move to a vote on the conference report this week. Passage of the report would put the Senate on record against apartheid, send a strong message to South African blacks that the Congress and the American people support their struggle, and make it clear to the South African Government that the United States will continue to press for genuine movement away from apartheid.

OLD DEFENDERS' DAY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today is old Defenders' Day, a legal holiday in the Free State of Maryland. On September 12, 1814, the Battle of North Point was begun. It was a turning point in the War of 1812. In 2 days of intense fighting, the soldiers and citizens of Baltimore, augmented by sailors manning city and harbor defenses, turned back the British attack and saved the city. Today we honor those defenders of the city.

Although this battle is not well enough known to many Americans, they all are aware of one of its results. Francis Scott Key, a Baltimore lawyer, wrote the words of the "Star-Spangled Banner" when, on the morning of September 14, he saw "Old Glory" still flying over Fort McHenry at the mouth of the Port of Baltimore.

The two keys to Baltimore's defense were Rogers' Bastion, an earthen defense east of the city, and Fort McHenry, protecting the sea side at Locust Point. Facing the fort across the channel to the inner harbor was the Lazaretto Battery, which fired upon an attacking contingent of small British boats. Caught between the battery and Fort McHenry, the British retreated. Rogers' Bastion stopped the British ground forces and when the British Navy's heavy gunning of Fort McHenry failed to force it to surrender and allow the British ships to pass to support the ground troops at Roger's Bastion, the British force withdrew on September 14. There were no engagements between American and British warships but the role of naval personnel was vital in helping the American soliders on land.

In an appropriate mixing of the old with the new, Defenders' Day this year was commemorated on Sunday, September 8, at Fort McHenry as Naval Reserve Day. Before a crowd estimated at 7,000, made up of Naval Reservists, their families, friends, and other visitors, the U.S.S. Hayler reenacted the bombardment of the fort. It was defended in 1814 by the citizen-soldiers of Baltimore, regular soldiers of the infantry and artillery, and 60 sailors from Commodore Barney's Chesapeake flotilla. This year, the 171st anniversary of the battle, the defenders were from the 2d Battalion of the 110th Field Artillery of the Maryland National Guard, dressed in uniforms of the earlier day and using muskets of the period.

Highlighting the role of the modern Navy and citizen-sailors, each of the 20 Naval Reserve Units of Baltimore gave a demonstration of what they do, using current landing craft and other small boats. The Naval Academy Band performed. A replica of the lighthouse at Lazaretto, easily visible from Fort McHenry, was dedicated. It was a happy, family day, building on past courage in defense of a young nation to show how traditions continue and that our Nation's security remains an obligation for all citizens.

The exploits of 1814 still shine in our national history and should be remembered as a lesson that from time to time society does require a price for the continued enjoyment of its benefits. The admirable record of 170 years of peace between the United States and Great Britian dispells any fear that we shall ever have to fight the battle of North Point again.

But as the human race evolves and society progresses there are inevitably new challenges and new dangers. We are not free of the threat of foreign aggression, but we also face new kinds of dangers in a world that has rapidly become interdependent and therefor highly vulnerable.

It's such a world, the state of our economy may well be as vital to our security as the state of our military forces. Defensive action may require courage and effort as in the past, but today the goals may be different. Defense may demand higher productivity, greater thrift, less luxury, and a willingness to dedicate a larger share of the fruits of our labors to the general welfare. Whatever is needed, I am confident that Marylanders will not be found waiting.

REPRESENTATIVE SONNY MONTGOMERY RECEIVES L. MENDEL RIVERS AWARD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wish to commend and to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, Hon. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY, on being awarded the L. Mendel Rivers Award of the Noncommissioned Officers Association, on last evening in recognition of his legislative efforts in contribution to the defense of our country.

Chairman MONTGOMERY served more than 35 years in the military, including service in World War II and the Korean war. He has continued to contribute to the defense of this Nation as a leading member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, which he chairs, and the House Armed Services Committee. Congressman MONTGOMERY has also received recognition from the Paralyzed Veterans of America for his lifetime of service to veterans—an honor which I was proud to receive this year.

His support and leadership in the House made possible the creation of a special commemorative medal honoring those missing or unaccounted for in Southeast Asia—a measure which I also offered in the Senate.

I am grateful to SONNY for his help in that regard, and I am pleased for the many opportunities we have had over the years to work together on behalf of America's veterans and in furtherance of a strong national defense.

SONNY MONTGOMERY's leadership on these issues sets a standard for all of his colleagues in the Congress. I am pleased to offer my heartfelt congratulations to SONNY on his being awarded the L. Mendel Rivers Award.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(During the quorum call Mr. GOLDWATER occupied the chair.)

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICKLES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I believe we are in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is now closed.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1200) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to effectively control the unauthorized immigration to the United States, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the patience of my colleagues—matched only by my own and that of the minority member of the subcommittee, Senator KENNEDY. We are ready to proceed now with the immigration legislation. There have been some accommodations made. An amendment or two that would have taken a great deal of time perhaps have been resolved, and we await in a very few minutes Senator WILSON to present a very important amendment. He will be taking that up. It is one that deserves your careful attention. But at this point I yield to Senator MAX BAUCUS who has an amendment with regard to user fees.

AMENDMENT NO. 593

(Purpose: To eliminate the provisions allowing the imposition of fees for an alien's use of border facilities)

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], for himself and Mr. WARNER, proposes an amendment numbered 593.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 5, beginning with line 5, strike out all through the bottom of the page.

On page 2, in the Table of Contents, strike out the item relating to section 102.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this amendment is the same amendment that I offered to the immigration bill in 1983. That amendment passed by a vote of 91 to 3. This amendment, like the earlier one, would delete the provisions of the bill which authorize the Immigration and Naturalization Service to impose a fee on aliens who cross the U.S. border coming into the United States.

Mr. President, the provision in this bill is slightly different from the provision of the bill in the 98th Congress. The earlier bill required the Immigration and Naturalization Service to impose this border fee. This year's bill gives the Service discretion to impose a fee on aliens. In either event, Mr. President, I think that the provision is a bad idea. I do not think that we as Americans should be imposing fees on aliens as they cross the border to come to the United States.

We have a history in America of being an open country. We receive travelers, we receive visitors, we receive citizens, and we receive aliens into the United States to travel, visit, or do whatever they may wish. I think it is a policy we should continue. It is a policy we should maintain. I do not think that the country should now start imposing fees on aliens as they come into the United States.

Requiring that fees be paid at the border is inconsistent with the policies of our neighbors, Canada and Mexico, which do not impose fees on Americans who may enter Canada or Mexico. If we were to impose a fee, it seems to me that those countries might think turnaround is fair play. Then, they too would impose fees. We would be going down a road that would make no sense and could lead to a series of escalating fees and counterfees.

Beyond that, I must inform these Members of this body who are not already aware of it, that it is not only the INS that wants border fees. The Customs Service too wants to impose fees. There is a bill wending its way through the Congress right now which may entitle the Customs Service to impose fees on all travelers—whether they be aliens or Americans, entering the United States from whatever origin, whatever source, air, land or sea.

It seems to me we are getting into the situation in which various services and U.S. agencies are thinking about imposing fees on American and/or aliens who enter the United States. Such programs can only create confusion and a lot of irritation at the border, not only for Americans, but for foreigners who travel to and from the United States.

Beyond all of that, I think this provision of the INS imposing fees is degrading. The estimated border fees would be only 25 cents to $1 per person. Collecting these fees would be like the American Government holding a tin cup at the border and telling all foreigners coming into the United States to put a quarter or 50 cents into the American tin cup. We would not be getting a lot of money from it. It would be almost like begging foreign travelers to help us out.

Another problem with the provision is that it contains no dedication. This money would go to the general fund. It would not necessarily go to the INS to support costs of the Service. The theory for most user fees lately is that they should cover the cost of the certain service for which they are charged. That is simply not the case under section 102 of S. 1200.

So for a whole host of reasons, Mr. President, I think that we should again resoundingly defeat and strike out this provision of the bill. I repeat that this provision was defeated by a vote of 91 to 3 last year. I see no reason why it should not be defeated overwhelmingly again this year.

I am joined by Senator WARNER who is a cosponsor of my amendment this year, as he was in 1983. He too thinks it is a bad idea. I encourage Senators to vote to delete this provision of the bill and vote for this amendment.

I see my able neighbor, the Senator from Wyoming, standing. He has, as we all know, performed dedicated, and exemplary service in trying to get this bill passed. We all look up to him for leadership and guidance on immigration legislation. It is my understanding that, as further evidence of the Senator's wisdom, he is going to accept this amendment.

I thank the Senator for that.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do thank my neighbor to the north, Senator BAUCUS, for his remarks. I have enjoyed working with him on many things. His State does border our great sister country of Canada and he speaks with clarity on the issue, as he has done before. It is something that we accept. We had it in the bill originally as a provision intended to provide the opportunity for the Immigration Service to require some minimal fee to offset the cost of providing services at ports of entry. That was requested at one time by some in the agency.

I changed the measure this year to make the fees optional rather than mandatory, as in the last Congress.

I understand the feeling, coming from a State with a significant tourist economy.

I accept the amendment, which I believe will alleviate the fears of the tourism industry and others that fees might affect the entry of visitors. Until we get into a more bilateral discussion of this matter, I think it appropriate that it should be removed. We will try to hold to that in conference activity.

Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable to this floor manager and I understand it is also acceptable to the floor manager on the other side, Senator KENNEDY.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], in offering this amendment to the Immigration Reform Act.

Two years ago, when the Senate last addressed this issue, 91 of our colleagues went on record in opposition to an immigration fee being levied on persons who enter the United States from abroad.

This Senator must express his disappointment that in spite of that very strong statement by the Senate, a provision is included in the bill before us giving the Attorney General discretion to levy fees on persons entering the United States from abroad.

Mr. President, so as to avoid any confusion about what the Senate did on this issue, I ask unanimous consent that the discussion on this issue, as it appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on May 16 and 17, 1983, be printed at the end of my statement.

I wish to advise my colleagues that those organizations which joined the Senators from Montana and Virginia in opposition to the immigration fee 2 years ago continue to support our position today.

Their position, as reflected in the letters which were made a part of that 1983 debate, is unchanged.

Mr. President, during my term in the Senate I have vigorously worked to promote two basic principles of our society.

The first is the freedom to travel.

The second is the freedom to assemble and speak.

Both of these principles lie at the heart of this issue, and both are the foundation of America's second largest industry, the travel and tourism industry.

In 1981, the Congress passed, and the President signed into law the National Tourism Policy Act.

One of the basic objectives of that act was to encourage the free and open exchange of foreign travelers to our country, and the elimination or reduction of all barriers to that exchange.

During my tensure as cochairman of the Senate Tourism Caucus, I have worked with all Senators in support of proposals to promote both foreign and domestic travel to and in the United States.

The imposition of an immigration fee, whether it be mandatory, as proposed in the original immigration bill 2 years ago, or discretionary, as proposed in this bill, stands in the face of every effort and achievement of the Senator from Virginia in this area.

I urge support for the amendment by the Senator from Montana and myself, and the elimination of all references to immigration fees from the pending legislation.

I yield the floor.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 1269

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) proposes an amendment numbered 1269.

Amend section 102, subsection 114 on page 121, line 14, by deleting the word "shall" and insert the word "may" after the words "Secretary of State".

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I extend my congratulations to the Senator from Wyoming and others who have drafted this legislation, especially the visa waiver section of the bill.

With the adoption of this section of the bill, one of the major obstacles to increased travel from abroad by tourists and business people will be eliminated.

This provision goes a long way toward the effective implementation of the National Tourism Policy Act, a measure of which I was a cosponsor and, as cochairman of the Senate Tourism Caucus, I actively support.

Mr. President, there is, however, a section of the bill having to do with the entry fees which causes me some concern. It stands in the face of the Tourism Policy Act, in my judgment and I am inquiring if the Senator from Wyoming is aware of this problem and also if the Senator is open to modification of this section.

As the Senator from Wyoming is aware, numerous organizations, including the Travel and Tourism Government Affairs Policy Council, the Motor Coach Tour Industry Association, the Air Transport Association, of America, and the American Automobile Association, have all expressed their concern over the hasty implementation of this section, and the problems, which might ensue.

By making the modification I suggest, the Senate will bring the bill in conformity with the House, thereby effectively resolving the problem associated with the entry fee issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to have printed in the RECORD certain documentation to support the views of the enumerated organizations about which I have spoken.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 9, 1983.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
U.S. Senate, Senate Dirksen Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SIMPSON: We wish to use this opportunity to express our concern about Sec. 114 of S. 529 which would require the Attorney General to impose fees on aliens entering the U.S.

A recent survey by the "Official Airline Guide" has revealed that of 127 countries throughout the world only Venezuela imposes an "immigration fee." It is true that departure fees are common world-wide and the U.S. as an example also has a departure fee.

In so far as the U.S. receives its 3rd largest share of export earnings from international visitors and the U.S. Congress in passing the National Tourism Policy Act established a policy to . . . "encourage the free and welcome entry of individuals traveling to the U.S. . . ." (Sec. 101(b)(4)) Public Law 97-63, we do not believe it in the national interest to charge a fee for this type of alien visitor who in essence is responsible for creating 289,000 jobs in the U.S.

In reviewing Committee Report (98-62) the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the cost to INS of increasing border patrols (the only reference to costs recoverable under Sec. 114) will be approximately $85 million in 1984 and $70-80 million annually thereafter. The report further goes on to note that "based on information provided INS," CBO estimates (that the cost of processing aliens) will cost INS $40 million a year. CBO further suggests that "the INS would be able to recover this cost by imposing a fee of 20 cents per entry in 1983, with small upward adjustments in subsequent years to reflect inflation. This fee would be classified as a revenue to the government. In reviewing this proposal we infer:

(1) The majority of the increase in costs to INS are attributable to supplemental border patrols and enforcement activities;

(2) These costs are largely unrelated to the processing of short-term business and pleasure travelers to the United States;

(3) These costs will thus be recovered, to an undefinable degree, from "users" who neither generate these costs nor benefit from the facilities and "services" provided.

It is our view that a fee imposed on "international visitors" is discriminatory. Presently, the airlines indirectly bear the costs of inspection facilities, and the cost to briefly examine passports and visas, a government cost, is minimal.

We urge that you clarify, on the floor, the intent of Sec. 114 so as not to include "international visitors."

Sincerely,

JAMES E. GAFFIGAN,
Executive Director.

MEMORANDUM

USER FEE PROPOSAL CONTAINED IN S. 529, THE IMMIGRATION, REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1983

Section 114 of S. 529 (see Appendix I) would amend the Immigration and Nationality Act by adding a section entitled "Nonimmigrant Visa Fees and Border Facility Fees." Subsection (b) requires that "The Attorney General, after consultation with the Secretary of State shall impose fees for an alien's use of border facilities in an amount necessary to make the total of such fees substantially equal to the cost of maintaining and operating such facilities and services."

Included in the Committee Report (No. 98-62) is the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) Cost Estimate (Appendix II) which is germaine to the fee issue. CBO estimates that the cost to INS of increasing border patrols (the only reference to costs recoverable under this section) will be approximately $85 million in 1984, and $70-80 million annually thereafter. The CBO report further finds that "Based on information provided by INS" CBO estimates (that the cost of processing aliens) will cost INS $40 million a year. CBO further suggests that "INS would be able to recover this cost by imposing a fee of $0.20 per entry in 1983, with small upward adjustments in subsequent years to reflect inflation. This fee would be classified as a revenue to the Government."

From this information the following can be inferred:

(1) The majority of the increase in costs to INS are attributable to supplemental border patrols and enforcement activities;

(2) These costs are largely unrelated to the processing of short-term business and pleasure travelers of the United States;

(3) These costs will thus be recoverd, to an undefinable degree, from "users" who neither generate these costs nor benefit from the facilities and "services" provided.

It is important to recognize that the legislative language expressly makes allowance for the subsidization of particular users by others, i.e. ". . . shall impose fees . . . in an amount necessary to make the total of such fees substantially equal to the cost of maintaining and operating such facilities and services." However, a fee structure which in design allows an arbitrary assignment of cost and benefit has been attempted in the past and subsequently addressed in the Courts.

Congress made its initial declaration of intent in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act of 1952. Title V provides that:

". . . Government activities resulting in special benefits or privileges for individuals or organizations be financially self-sustaining to the maximum possible extent"; and ". . . Regulations prescribing fees be as nearly uniform as practicable"; and

". . . Fees be fair and equitable, taking into consideration direct and indirect costs to the Government, value to the recipient, public policy or interest served and pertinent facts."

In 1959, a Bureau of the Budget Circular was issued, which attempted to interpret the 1954 Act for the agencies, and advise them with respect to its implementation.

"Where a service (or privilege) provides special benefits to an identifiable recipient above and beyond those which accrue to the public at large, a charge should be imposed to recover the full cost to the Federal Government of rendering the service. For example, a special benefit will be considered to accrue and a charge should be imposed when a Government-rendered service:

(a) Enables the beneficiary to obtain more immediate or substantial gains or values (which may or may not be measureable in monetary terms) than those which accure to the general public (e.g., receiving a patent, crop insurance, or a license to carry on a specific business); or

(b) Provides business stability or assures public confidence in the business activity of the benficiary (e.g., certificates of necessity and convenience for airline routes, or safety inspections of craft);

(c) Is performed at the request of the recipient and is above and beyond the service regularly received by other members of the same industry or groups, or of the general public (e.g., receiving a passport, visa, airman's certificate, or an inspection after regular duty hours)."

The FCC established a fee schedule in 1964 which imposed a nominal "filing fee.' The revenues raised covered approximately 25 percent of the agency's budget. In 1970, in response to the encouragement of both Congress and the Executive Branch, the FCC raised the fees to recover its full costs of operation. A group of cable operators challenged the fee structure and the Supreme Court held in 1975 that the assessment per subscriber was a tax, rather than a fee, since it was not related to a special benefit conferred by the FCC (NCTA v. U.S.). In a related case decided simultaneously (FCC v. New England Power Co.), the Court held that ". . . no charge should be made for services rendered when the identification of the ultimate beneficiary is obscure and the service can be primarily considered as benefitting broadly the general public." These represent the only Supreme Court rulings on these issues.

In 1975, the FCC issued a new fee schedule which it perceived to be consistent with the Court's ruling. Again the structure was challenged, and the Court of Appeals held that the new fee structure did not meet the Supreme Court's criteria. The FCC was ordered to develop a new fee schedule as well as clarify the basis for their assessment. The agency interpreted the Court rulings as requiring an assessment of fees based, to some degree, on the value conferred on the user. The FCC ultimately decided that it could not quantify the benefit or value being conferred upon the user, and suspended the collection of all fees in 1977. Though a committee was appointed to determine the most equitable method of refunding the previously collected fees, none have yet been refunded.

Also in 1977, the GAO issued a report which took exception with the FCC's interpretation of the rulings. "GAO does not believe that the Court of Appeals required the Commission to measure separately the value conferred upon the people paying the fee. Instead, based upon interpretation of the court decisions, the Commission can establish a proper fee schedule based solely upon cost." Nonetheless, neither GAO nor Congress have offered any further assistance in calculating an equitable fee schedule based upon cost.

For purposes of this legislation three basic questions arise:

(1) if fees must reflect "direct and indirect costs to the Government" (according to the 1954 Act), what part of INS' costs are "fairly and equitably" allocable to the international traveler? Which of these costs are not already being paid by transportation modes in the form of "facilities use fees"? Is border patrol and enforcement activity an appropriate cost to be subsidized by the international traveler?

(2) what part or aspect of the operation of such facilities can be considered a "value or benefit" which is conferred upon the traveler? INS inspections are distinct from, for example, Department of Agriculture meat grading and inspection services as INS inspections in no way provide "business stability or assure public confidence in the business activity of the beneficiary." Further, INS inspections are not performed "at the request of the beneficiary" nor do they "enable the beneficiary to obtain more immediate or substantial gains or values." Presumably, the ratio of charges should be set equal to the ratios of marginal benefits and the absolute level set to recover full cost. In this case, however, it seems clear that all benefit is recouped by citizens of the United States who are expressly exempted from charge by the language of the bill.

(3) what public policy or interest is served by the imposition of such fees on the traveler? The proposed fees are clearly antithetical to public policy concerns.

IMPLEMENTATION PROBLEMS

There is a multitude of negative implications with respect to the implementation of Sec. 114 of the bill. For example, the proposed fee is discriminatory inasmuch as it would be imposed upon aliens only. A recent survey of 127 countries revealed that only Venezuela imposes an "immigration fee." All other head taxes, departure taxes, etc. are paid by both aliens and nationals. The discriminatory aspect of this fee proposal violates a number of international agreements and many airline bilateral agreements would have to be modified or renegotiated. In addition, this legislation would obviously encourage other countries to initiate the same practice with an attendant risk of abuse.

There are a number of practical considerations as well. For example, how would the fee be collected? Collection at inspection is also problematic. Visitors without U.S. currency would have no choice but to interrupt the inspection, locate a currency exchange desk, and return to the inspection. Collection at this point is also inconsistent with the ASIST pre-clearance procedure. An integral aspect of ASIST clearance is the frequent performance of Customs inspections by INS inspectors, as well as the performance of INS inspections by Customs inspectors. As the legislation requires the imposition of INS fees only, some passengers may be charged while others are not. Alternatively, ASIST could be modified, but presumably only in such a way as to defeat the purpose of the procedure. At airports where ASIST has not yet been implemented, collection of the fee at inspection would of course exacerbate existing delays and long lines.

Similar problems would occur with all transportation modes; as well as with border crossings by foot. At Canadian points-of-entry, where visas are not required, inspectors would encounter the additional difficulty of distinguishing between aliens and citizens. An alien who merely claims to be a U.S. citizen would be likely to successfully avoid paying the fee. It is also possible that an alien might simply refuse to pay the fee, presenting the U.S. with the option of either foregoing the fee or instituting deportation proceedings.

Also disturbing is the inequity made apparent by CBO's observation that the additional monies will be primarily used to fund border patrols and enforcement activities.

Finally, as public policy the fee proposal is inconsistent with our national economic interests. Twenty-three million international visitors spent $12.2 billion in the U.S. in 1981 generating $1.1 billion in federal, state and local tax revenue and supporting approximately 300,000 jobs. At a time when our international competitive position is deteriorating and the U.S. is seeking ways to prevent further erosion, travel and tourism is our third largest source of export income. It is clear from our perspective that whatever revenues are raised must be viewed as inconsequential relative to the harassment and inconvenience that will inevitably be imposed upon international travelers.

JONES, JONES, BELL,
CLOSE & BROWN, CHARTERED,
Washington, D.C., May 6, 1983.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SIMPSON: In follow-up to our telephone conversation, I am writing to elaborate on the concerns of the motorcoach tour industry with respect to the entry fees proposed in Section 114 of S. 529, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1983.

The imposition of user fees on aliens crossing our Mexican and Canadian borders by tour bus would be a significant burden to the tour bus industry and its clientele. The fees would not be cost-effective. They would adversely affect the United States tourism industry, economy, our balance of payments deficits, and our perception throughout the world as a country that welcomes the exchange of visitors and ideas through international tourism.

I offer this conclusion for the following reasons:

1. Section 114 violates the specific statutory mandate of the National Tourism Policy Act of 1981 (P.L. 97-63). Under Section 101(b)(4), the Act establishes a national tourism policy to "encourage the free and welcome entry of individuals traveling to the United States in order to enhance international understanding and goodwill."

2. The fee contradicts general foreign policy goals of encouraging foreign travel to the United States and certainly contradicts the general goal and objective of attempting to reduce our burgeoning balance of payments deficit. In 1981, over 33.6 million Canadians crossed our borders into the United States. Almost 1.3 million of them came by bus. In 1980, the average visitor spent $1,700 while in the United States. Any federal user fee on aliens that would curtail the flow of foreign visitors to the United States would be counter-productive to our economy. Furthermore, since one new job is generated for every $37,750 spent on travel and tourism, any loss of travel and tourism dollars from Mexican and Canadian tourists would adversely affect jobs in the United States.

3. In the tour bus context, any entry fee initiatives from the American government would invite an almost certain retaliatory "entry fee" burden by the nations of Canada and Mexico. Therefore, it is a real and substantial threat to our domestic tour bus industry. For the most part, the tour bus industry caters to middle, fixed-income travelers who would be discouraged from the tour package plan by any additional, $5 to $25 entry fees. Canada, for example, was the destination of about 39.8 million United States citizens in 1981. Of these visitors to Canada, almost 1.5 million traveled to Canada by bus. The imposition of retaliatory border fees on Americans by foreign governments may mean that many of our own citizens, including a large percentage of senior citizens, may forgo a trip.

4. The fees would be either too onerous and discourage travel, or they would be too small to justify the administrative hassle entailed in collecting them and enforcing the program. The tour bus industry is very distressed at the prospect that once the fee door is opened, the characteristic bureaucratic enthusiasms about funding all agency expenses from this new revenue source will occur. All the statutory language in the world cannot prevent an enterprising administrator from loading a lot of agency costs on the points of entry to offset other general budget expenditures.

5. Implementation of the alien "user fee" poses substantial administrative dilemmas related to the method of collecting the fee. If a percentage of the fee is to be collected in advance as part of a travel package, what is the administrative machine that pursues collection? Individual payment at the time of entry conjures another major irritant for the foreign visitor attempting to cross into the United States. Will a foreign tourist who claims US citizenship be excused from the entry fee? What would happen to an alien who refuses to pay the fee? Would he be deported? We have enough practical barriers already at our border points. Inevitably, the proposed entry fee would aggravate the already long delays in airline passenger entry into our country, as well. Enclosed are the foreign visitor statistics of just one country, Canada. The practical problems associated with collecting the entry fee from 33 million Canadian visitors to the United States is awesome. This problem will only be multiplied when all the foreign visitors from Europe, Japan, and other areas of the world are included.

6. The proposed user fee is blatantly discriminatory. It is imposed only on aliens. A recent study of 127 countries disclosed that only Venezuela imposes an "immigration fee." All other departure taxes, head taxes, etc., are paid by both aliens and nationals.

7. There is an inherent inegality in asking a foreign visitor from Canada or Mexico to subsidize United States border administration and enforcement costs that are totally unrelated to processing a Canadian or Mexican business or tourist visitor. The question of why should they pay for border patrols, guard dogs, shotguns, vehicles, and search lights that have nothing to do with their coming and going from the country can legitimately be raised. The processing of aliens crossing our borders is conducted to enforce our immigration laws and protect our national interests. The proposed fee is largely unrelated to the administrative costs of processing short-term leisure or business visitors.

The above comments represent a partial summary of the serious questions and problems engendered by Section 114.

I appreciate your consideration of these concerns. If I can be of any help or assistance with this issue, please let me know.

I remain,

Sincerely,

JAMES D. SANTINI,
Attorney at Law.

AIR TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., May 4, 1983.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SIMPSON: The Air Transport Association has followed the Immigration and Reform Act, S. 529, with great interest. We are pleased with, and support, the visa waiver provision contained in the bill, but are concerned about Section 218(b) which would require the Attorney General to impose fees on aliens entering the U.S. for the use of border facilities and services of the Immigration and Naturalization Services.

We oppose the imposition of fees on arriving international travelers because the basic responsibilities of the INS were established by the Congress in the broad national interest and do not uniquely benefit the airlines or airline passengers. The proposed legislation directly conflicts with the goal of the National Tourism Policy Act of 1981 to "encourage the free and welcome entry of individuals traveling to the United States," and will inhibit the Secretary of Commerce in the performance of his duty to "encourage to the maximum extent feasible travel to and from the United States . . ." 22 U.S.C. Sec. 2123(b)(12). It is also inconsistent with the clear policy of the Trade Act of 1974, which called for the reduction and elimination of barriers to international trade. Further, it also would contravene the treaty obligations of the United States under the Chicago Convention.

An INS "user fee" for the use of INS facilities for airline passengers would be discriminatory because the airlines and other tenants already bear the costs of the inspection facilities at airports. Therefore, there is no cost associated with airport inspection facilities for the INS. The only remaining cost would be for the brief examination of passports and visas. Since that inspection is performed for the protection of U.S citizens, it cannot be interpreted as a service for the benefit of the alien. Therefore, it would be a violation of the guidelines for user fees as expressed by the President in his budget message for FY '83.

The United States would be virtually alone in the developed world in assessing INS inspection fees if this measure is adopted. (While some countries levy departure fees they are used generally for tourism promotion.) For this reason, any change in the current law would require protracted consultations with other nations under the terms of existing bi-lateral agreements to determine the reasonableness of the new charge. The imposition of an INS "user fee" would invite retaliation and opposition by other nations as it did last year when the U.S. Customs Service proposed a similar fee for its services. (See the attached list for a complete summary of those countries and groups who opposed the previous proposal.) Substantive changes in law with such widespread international implications require thorough examination in a separate hearing process.

Leaders from the tourism industry and from cities which have U.S. international airports fear that procedures, such as the collection of an alien user fee, would create more delays for arriving visitors and would discourage tourism. Some cities have already experienced the negative economic impact of a downturn in the tourism industry as the direct result of the inefficient federal inspection system. (See attached memorandum re: Miami International Airport.)

The imposition of a fee for INS services on aliens will exacerbate ongoing problems of congestion at U.S. airports of entry. For years the airlines, airports, tourism industry and others have worked to minimize long delays for aliens and returning citizens going through the inspection process. Only recently have efforts been successful in obtaining some relief—but these measures are just the beginning. The entire inspection system, including INS, Customs, and Agriculture must be restructured into a system for the most cost-effective and expeditious inspection of passengers and cargo entering the country. Without significant modification of the current system, stop-gap measures, such as "user fees," serve no purpose.

We respectfully urge that the imposition of an INS "user fee" be deferred and that the concept of a consolidated federal inspection system, as described in the enclosed analysis, be examined as an alternative means of improved manpower and financial resource management.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM J. BURHOP,
Senior Vice President, Government Affairs.

EXCERPTS FROM THE REPORT OF THE AIRPORT ACCESS TASK FORCE ON GROUNDSIDE CONGESTION

FEDERAL INSPECTION SERVICES

Federal Inspection Services (FIS) at U.S. airports are a significant cause of groundside congestion and delay for international air passengers and shippers. FIS congestion and delay detrimentally impact international passenger and cargo facilitation, disrupt the ability of arriving international air passengers to make planned domestic flight connections, significantly affect the movement of urgent shipments in international commerce and can affect the capacity of an airport to accommodate international traffic.

The Airport Access Task Force recommends that:

1. The Federal Government, through the Secretary of Transportation, ensure that studies funded through Federal planning grants to states, regional agencies, and local entities address airport ground access problems and solutions. Such studies include those efforts which lead to the development of state, regional, and local land use, transportation and airport master plans. Timely and effective review and coordination between the various Federal agencies (FHWA, FAA, UMTA, etc.) that provide planning funds should be accomplished to ensure identification of potential problems involving groundside congestion;

2. Congress encourage and support the concept of coordinated and cooperative or joint funding of projects to develop airport ground access facilities by such agencies as the Federal Aviation Administration, Federal Highway Administration, Urban Mass Transportation Administration, state and local governments—since many access problems are not just airport problems;

3. Congress encourage and authorize the use of Federal funds through existing programs for projects to install ground transportation information systems in airport and off-airport terminals. Such information systems should provide up-to-date information about available ground transportation alternatives for the air traveler;

4. Congress support and encourage the development of off-airport terminal facilities by authorizing the use of Federal funds for the development of such facilities. Further, that the Federal Government support and encourage the development of these facilities by ensuring that, during the planning and project development of such facilities, state and local, as well as Federal authorities, are made aware of available funding and coordinate planning and development activities. Further, that airports and airlines recognize that these facilities can be a cost-effective means of relieving congestion at the terminal, approach roads, and parking lot of an airport. Finally, efforts should be focused on overcoming problems associated with remote baggage handling, ticketing, and other passenger services;

5. Services' procedure be modernized and simplified to maximize the efficient use of resources (e.g., dual channel "red/green door" and "one-step" procedures and automated systems such as the National Cargo Control System) and that cross-training of FIS employees be required;

6. Congress consider the consolidation and streamlining of the Federal Inspection Services so as to expedite passenger and cargo flow through ports as well as reduce operating costs;

7. Priority go to staffing that is commensurate with the activity of the port of entry so as to minimize delay; and

8. FIS costs continue to be recognized as costs to be borne by all taxpayers, since the Federal laws requiring inspection were enacted to protect the nation and all of its citizens.

INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS AND RECOMMENDED PRACTICES, FACILITATION, ANNEX 9 TO THE CONVENTION ON INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION, JULY 1980

Annex 9—Facilitation

3.8.5. Recommended Practice.—Visas should in all cases include the following information given in the order shown:

(a) number of visa;

(b) type of visa;

(c) date of issue, showing day, month and year in that order;

(d) date of expiry, showing day, month and year in that order;

(e) number of entries permitted;

(f) authorized duration of each stay.

3.8.6. Recommended Practice.—Numerals 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 0 and the Gregorian calendar (with months being spelled out in full) should be used in furnishing the information listed in 3.8.5.

3.8.7. Recommended Practice.—When the text of the visa is in a national language other than English, French or Spanish, one of these three languages should also be used.

III.—ADDITIONAL DOCUMENTATION

3.9 Recommended Practice.—Contracting States should not require either from temporary visitors traveling by air, or from operators on their behalf, any information in writing supplementary to or repeating that already presented in their identity documents.

3.10 A Contracting State which continues to require written supplementary information from temporary visitors traveling by air, shall limit its requirements to the items and shall follow the format set forth in Appendix 3—Embarkation/Disembarkation Card. Contracting States shall accept the Embarkation/Disembarkation Card when completed by temporary visitors and shall not require it to be completed or checked by the operator. Legible hand-written script shall be accepted on the card, except where the form specifies block lettering.

3.10.1 Recommended Practice.—Contracting States which require the presentation of Embarkation/Disembarkation Cards should provide them to airline operators for distribution to passengers.

IV.—PUBLIC HEALTH REQUIREMENTS

3.11 In cases where evidence of protection against yellow fever is required from persons travelling by air, Contracting States shall accept the International Certificate of Vaccination or Revaccination in the form set out by the World Health Organization in Appendix 2 of the International Health Regulations (1969).

3.12 Recommended Practice.—Medical examination of persons arriving by air should normally be limited to those disembarking and coming within the incubation period of the disease concerned, as stated in the International Health Regulations (1969), from an area infected with one of the three quarantinable disease (plague, cholera and yellow fever).

V.—CLEARANCE PROCEDURES

3.13 Except in special circumstances, Contracting States shall not require that identity documents be collected from passengers or crew before they arrive at the passport control points.

3.13.1 After individual presentation by passengers and crew of the identity documents, the public officials concerned shall, except in special individual cases, hand back such documents immediately after examination, rather than withholding them for purposes of obtaining additional control.

3.14 In giving effect to paragraph 3.2, Contracting States shall ensure that examination by clearance control officials is performed as expeditiously as possible.

3.15 Each Contracting State shall make arrangements whereby the identity document of a temporary visitor need be inspected by only one official at times of entry and departure.

Note.—This provision is intended to ensure inspection of the identity document of a temporary visitor by only one official on behalf of both the Immigration and Police authorities. It is not intended to discourage Health and Customs officials from examining the identity document whenever this may facilitate health and customs clearance of the temporary visitor.

3.16 Contracting States shall accept an oral declaration of baggage from passengers and crew.

3.17 Contracting States shall normally accompany inbound passenger baggage inspection on a sampling selective basis.

MEMORANDUM

JANUARY 7, 1983.

To: Honorable Mayor and Board of County Commissioners.

From: M. R. Stierheim, County Manager.

Subject: Federal Inspection Process, Miami International Airport.

Miami International Airport has for well over 20 years suffered with regard to the ability to process arriving international passengers at an adequate rate. This is basically the result of far greater growth at MIA than elsewhere and continuation of historical staffing patterns by the federal agencies favoring areas such as New York. The problem is further complicated at Miami by a much higher percentage of alien arrivals as compared to other major gateways, more difficult processing because of points of origin and, more recently, because of narcotics control measures.

In spite of tremendous local investment in facilities, extensive efforts to obtain improved agency staffing levels and to obtain improved processing procedures, the problem is now worse than ever. On the three days following New Years day the situation at MIA was a disaster. Delays of up to four hours were recorded with average clearance times during some periods exceeding 2½ hours. The established goal for Miami is 45 minutes for peak periods; i.e., worst case.

The effects of this situation are many, serious and long lasting:

1. The international arrivals facility is designed to meter the flow of passengers from the aircraft to the federal inspection passenger processing stations in Immigration and Customs. As a consequence, only limited seating is necessary and, therefore, available.

All halls and passageways were jammed. Access to rest rooms was restricted. Seating for the elderly or infirm was non-existent. People became ill. Police were required to control the crowds to prevent a riot. Safety and health were endangered. Passengers, some completing a lengthy and tiring trip of up to 10 hours, were forced to stand for well over two hours. For the first time in the history of Miami International Airport, passengers had to be held on aircraft as there was no space for them in the international arrivals area.

2. Connecting schedules are based on allowing 1½ hours between flights. Many passengers missed connections because of delays in processing. Many faced either added costs or great inconvenience waiting for another flight.

Airlines, already in a highly tenuous financial plight, were forced to leave with empty seats while the passenger holding the ticket stood in a line for processing and, in many cases, pay for overnight accommodations.

3. One of the major strengths of Miami's air traffic system and the economies of our air carriers is the international hubbing and connecting traffic patterns which have been carefully developed during the decade of the 70's. This connecting traffic supports the routes which provide service for terminating passengers visiting South Florida and also the cargo lift crucial to our community.

The current problem has been an inability to meet volume demands with the staffing available and procedures utilized by one of the four federal agencies involved in the federal inspection process at MIA; namely, Immigration, a part of the U.S. Justice Department responsible to the Attorney General. It should be pointed out that the staffing by Immigration during the worst portion of our recent crisis totaled 13 inspectors. This is equal to the number of inspectors available for the same period in 1970, thirteen years ago. Permanent staffing at the Airport by INS is not acceptable even for the off peak traffic periods. Miami absolutely cannot tolerate this situation.

Permanent staffing assigned to the Airport by Immigration must be brought to or maintained at levels commensurate with traffic volume and levels at other major international gateways. This means that actual trained, available inspectors must meet these levels, not "approved positions", "inspectors on temporary assignment elsewhere", "at the training academy", etc.

Regional/District management must recognize the peak traffic periods that repeat like clockwork year in and year out at the Airport and take steps to meet them well in advance. Personnel must be assigned temporarily part time to the Airport from other duties. Vacations must be scheduled taking traffic levels into account, abuses of sick and funeral leave must be dealt with as a disciplinary matter. Unusual conditions must be anticipated and contingency staffing plans and procedures developed.

A pool of part time inspectors must be budgeted, hired and trained. They should be qualified aviation/airport employees so that they are available for any emergency. We have offered that the employees of the Aviation Department be trained for such part time requirements. We have even offered to pay the cost of the part time emergency employees.

The alternate solution and the only one that will be cost effective and provide the framework and management system to prevent continuous recurrence of incredible inspection clearance delays, is to change the system of inspection by creating one federal inspection agency with one management team, one budget and one responsible agency. The four federal inspection agencies have shown little willingness in the past to pursue this idea of a single inspection agency for a major airport even though the concept is used at smaller airports and land border crossings, and Congress has not been willing to legislate the single agency concept despite strong recommendations for such an inspection system from the General Accounting Office, various Congressional Oversight Committees, the Office of Management and Budget, Air Transport Association, fact finding committees, and numerous business leaders of national repute who have only needed to observe the existing four separate agency federal inspection system for a few hours, or be briefed that such a monster exists, to recommend the one agency concept. We understand that one of the inspection agencies (Customs) is now in support of the one agency concept at airports and would strongly support a test of such a system. Why not Miami and why not now? The more complicated question of whether there should be a single agency for the entire country can be dealt with separately.

Miami has the best international facilities in the world. It has the greatest international potential. It, unfortunately, has the worst reputation among international travelers. This makes the first item meaningless and will destroy the second.

[From the Miami Herald, Jan. 8, 1983]

END THE STACKUP

Among international travelers, Miami International Airport (MIA) is fast developing a reputation as a great place to suffer. Inexcusably irresponsible failures by U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and Customs officials are solely to blame. Their callous disregard for efficiency threatens not only the comfort, convenience, and safety of the travelers that they serve so poorly. These officials also endanger the reputation and economic-development potential of Greater Miami.

Few times are more predictable as peak-travel periods than the first several days after Jan. 1. At MIA's international-arrivals center on those days this year, however, the peak load almost became a mob. Credit inadequate INS and Customs staffing for that.

Travelers entering that MIA facility had just escaped up to 10 hours cramped in airliner seats, bear in mind. Because of the INS-Customs breakdown, this is what they found:

All halls were jammed. Few seats were available. Access to restrooms was restricted. People became ill. Tempers frayed. Eventually police were summoned to control the crowds, lest they riot.

The average international traveler being processed through MIA then had to wait 2½ hours to gain clearance. Some people waited as long as four hours. Who wouldn't be outraged?

The INS was most to blame. Even under normal conditions, INS staffing at MIA is skimpy. This time it was worse. For extended periods during the peak, only 13 INS agents staffed the 34 available inspection booths. INS's best effort was to man 19 booths. Even that level seldom was attained. One reason was the unprecedented amount of sick and funeral leave taken then by INS staff.

Customs provided 32 agents at peak. Because of strict, inefficient procedural rules, however, the Customs staff is prohibited from doing INS work, so the larger Customs staff made little difference.

This kind of outrage causes many serious ripple effects. The bad word travels fast and far. International travelers often are trend setters and opinion leaders back home.

Many of them missed connecting flights. Neither they nor the airlines need that. Airlines either make money or move operations elsewhere. Many are transferring their international business from MIA to Houston, Atlanta, Dallas-Ft. Worth, even Tampa and Orlando. Loss of that market share will affect passenger and cargo traffic at MIA.

It's simply intolerable that Miami should have to bear this unwarranted burden. Bureaucratic bungling of Federal agencies is principally at fault. From Customs and INS must come the obvious solution—and fast. They must assure sufficient staff at MIA to eliminate this recurring debacle.

Bureaucrats can be slow to move unless the political blowtorch of budgetary pressure is set alight beneath their backsides. South Florida's representatives in Washington have plenty of fuel and many matches. They should not hesitate to turn the heat high.

WORKING PAPER: CAB AIRPORT ACCESS TASK FORCE: WORKING GROUP C—AIRPORT ACCESS AND FEDERAL INSPECTION SERVICES, DECEMBER 17, 1982

(Presented by H. Clifton Madison, Vice President, Western Airlines)

Federal Inspection Services (FIS) at U.S. airports are among the major causes of groundside congestion and delay for air passengers and shippers. FIS congestion and delay detrimentally impacts international passenger and cargo facilitation, disrupts the ability of inbound international passengers to make planned domestic flight connections, and can potentially limit the capacity of an airport to accommodate international traffic. The FIS problem is, therefore, an appropriate area to be addressed by the Task Force as part of its examination of groundside issues.

In 1981, over 20 million international passengers were processed through FIS at U.S. gateway and preclearance airports, and this sector of air travel has shown consistent growth over the years. It is the stated policy of the U.S. government, as articulated in the International Air Transportation Competition Act of 1979, that international air travel should be encouraged from a greater number of U.S. gateway cities to a greater number of cities abroad. Unfortunately, U.S. customs and immigration inspector staffing has fallen behind the growth rate of international air travel.

There has been, and continues to be, severe congestion in processing international travelers through customs and immigration formalities at most U.S. airports of entry and preclearance airports. Delays, at times approaching 2 to 3 hours per flight, are not uncommon at the preclearance airports of Montreal and Toronto and at our airports in Alanta, Baltimore, Chicago, Denver, Detroit, Fort Lauderdale, Honolulu, Los Angeles, Miami, Houston, Minneapolis, New York (Kennedy), San Francisco, Seattle and Tampa, among others.

International airline operations are currently constrained at several U.S. airports due to FIS processing limitations. At New York (Kennedy), for example, the Airline Scheduling Committee must coordinate aircraft arrival schedules to accommodate hourly passenger processing limitations and thereby minimize congestion and delay at JFK International Arrivals Building gates and inspection facilities. At other airports, assignment of processing "slots" for arriving aircraft loads constrains operational flexibility and effective capacity. Unless significant increases in FIS staffing levels or streamlining of procedures are made, these problems will continue and worsen in the future.

Either adequate numbers of inspectors must be authorized by the Congress or a high priority program to reduce inspector workload—through modernization, simplification, and consolidation of the functions of the several inspection agencies—must be initiated. Measures to facilitate the entry of international air travelers and shipments have been recommended, including:

1. Consolidate the several inspection functions required for the clearance of travelers and goods entering the country.

2. Reallocate headquarters and regional resources to increase inspection agency manpower complements in the field.

3. Reduce and simplify the inspection process for Customs and Immigration to permit the most efficient use of available resources. Namely:

(a) extend preclearance—inspection of passengers and baggage prior to departure from a foreign country—to other locations,

(b) implement the red/green door inspection procedure—or a modification of it—whereby the traveler determines whether or not he must go through Customs formalities,

(c) extend the one-step inspection procedure now operational at Edmonton, Houston, Kennedy Airport satellite terminals, Los Angeles temporary facility and Philadelphia, to other U.S. airports of entry and preclearance airports,

(d) introduce sampling techniques for processing air passengers and freight,

(e) simplify U.S. Customs processing of U.S. international air freight through the introduction by that agency of an automated control system, and

(f) reduce inspection agency documentation requirements to process international air passengers and air freight, for example, by simplifying the shipper's export declaration and eliminating arrival/departure cards for transit without visa passengers.

4. Amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to simplify U.S. tariff schedule computations for assessing Customs duties covering freight importations into the United States, paralleling those changes already implemented for passengers baggage importations.

These measures will help meet the continued growth of international air travel and mitigate the need for major expansions in inspector staffing. A significant case-in-point is the ASIST procedure recently evaluated at Miami and Los Angeles. The procedure has simplified and significantly accelerated both immigration and customs inspection formalities, and has been an important first step toward the development of a more selective and efficient passenger inspection system which now should be expanded nationwide. Unfortunately, ASIST was terminated by Customs at Miami on November 1, 1982.

Under the ASIST procedure, immigration inspectors are augmented with customs inspectors at primary immigration booths. The inspectors of the two agencies are cross-trained to perform each other's functions as well as that of agriculture quarantine. Deplaning travelers undergo inspection formalities with only their hand-carried baggage in their possession. If an immigration, customs or agricultural problem arises, or if duty payment is required, the traveler is referred to the appropriate inspection agency secondary position. Checked baggage is not claimed by the passenger until primary inspection at the immigration booth is completed. The airport authorities at Miami and Los Angeles, the international airlines serving these locations, and arriving travelers have all acclaimed the ASIST procedure. Airports desiring to begin the procedure should be permitted to implement ASIST and other streamlined procedures at the earliest practicable time.

An immediate, short-term cause of current FIS congestion is the misguided reduction and curtailment of Customs and Immigration Inspectors staffing as a way of curbing federal expenditures. Unfortunately, in the government wide search for ways to curb expenditures, efforts are being made to shift the cost of providing many government services to the "beneficiaries" or "users" of such services.

Airlines and airline passengers are not the "beneficiaries" of Customs and immigration inspection services. They certainly are "users", but only because they are required by federal law to be inspected. They receive no special benefit unique to airlines or airline passengers from the inspection, in fact, the inspection process itself is a distinct disadvantage in terms of loss of time and convenience. What frequently is overlooked is that the federal laws requiring the inspection were enacted to protect the nation and all of its citizens—by preventing the entry of undesirable products and persons, by preventing the entry of animal and plant diseases, by tariff enforcement protecting American labor and business from destructive foreign competition and discrimination, and by collecting duties on imported goods. The cost of carrying out these laws should be borne by all taxpayers.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

FIS staffing levels today are unable to meet airport inspection demands without long delays and serious public inconvenience. This situation will worsen significantly unless immediate positive action is taken to deal with it. Either adequate numbers of inspectors, or a high priority program to reduce inspector workload—through the steps toward modernization, simplification, and consolidation of the inspection process cited above, are urgently needed. Other wise, FIS congestion and delay will continue to be a major groundside access constraint at U.S international airports and preclearance airports abroad.

SUMMARY OF COMMENTS FILED IN CUSTOMS' DOCKET ON USER FEES

1. OCEANAIR LINE

7-28-82: Seeks exemption of carriers operating smaller aircraft "as the additional costs would be quite burdensome."

2. JAPANESE GOVERNMENT

7-30-82: Seeks exemption "since U.S. commercial airlines to and from Japan are not charged any such fees as those proposed by the U.S. Customs Service."

3. NORTH DAKOTA AERONAUTICS COMMISSION

7-24-82: "North Dakota commercial air taxi operators * * * request an Exemption from the coverage of the rule or any part, thereof, for small entities."

Requests Customs to provide in its rule an alternative to the proposed amendments which will "* * * minimize such significant economic impact of the proposed rule to small entities." Such alternative should exclude all small commercial on-demand air taxi air carriers and other air carriers operating 60 passengers or less or 25,000 pounds of cargo, or 20 passengers or less or 12,500 pounds of cargo.

4. POMPANO AIRWAYS

7-26-82: Opposed to proposed rule. Pompano would be adversely affected by regulation.

5. AIR JAMAICA

7-28-82: Opposes proposed rule: 1. Economic burdens; 2. Discriminatory in that Jamaican government doesn't impose similar tax on U.S. carrier; and 3. Would violate provisions of Chicago Convention.

6. EUROPEAN NORTH ATLANTIC CARRIERS

7-27-82: Opposes proposed rule. Violation of Chicago Convention and various bilateral air transport agreements.

7. FAA

7-28-82: Strongly objects. Costs "of activities for which Customs proposes to levy charges on commercial aircraft operators" should be borne by the general public. Violates international agreements.

8. ITALIAN GOVERNMENT

7-26-82: Opposed. Violates current bilaterals. Would create imbalance between Alitalia and U.S.

9. AIR TRANSPORT ASSN. OF CANADA

7-21-82: Opposed. Unwarranted costs on Canadian air carriers serving U.S. points.

10. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

7-23-82: Opposed. ". . . would be inconsistent with international treaties and bilateral aviation agreements to which U.S. is a party."

11. HELLENIC CIVIL AVIATION AUTHORITY

7-26-82: Opposed. Costs should be borne by U.S. government.

12. REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA

7-26-82: Request for extra time.

13. BELGIAN DIRECTOR GENERAL OF CIVIL AVIATION

7-26-82: Opposed.

14. FRENCH GOVERNMENT

7-26-82: Authorities are presently studying proposal.

15. EMBASSY OF CANADA

7-26-82: Opposed. Would violate international agreements.

16. NATIONAL AIR CARRIER ASSN.

7-26-82: Opposed. 1. Discriminates between commercial and private aircraft; 2. Commercial aircraft pay for overtime Customs services and should not have to pay for normal hours of work; 3. Customs processing does not directly benefit air carriers; 4. Questions of law; and 5. Refrain from imposition till necessary legislation submitted to and approved by Congress.

17. JAPAN AIR LINES

7-26-82: Opposed. 1. Proposal based on erroneous construction of I.O.A.A.; 2. Proposal does not meet criteria for permissible service "fee"; 3. If burden to fall on some international airlines, must be done by Congressional legislation, not Customs regulation; 4. Airlines should not be expected to bear economic burden; and 5. Imposition of fees may provoke retaliation by other countries against U.S. airlines operating abroad.

18. NY-NJ PORT AUTHORITY

7-26-82: Opposed. Airlines should not have to bear burden.

19. PRINAIR

7-26-82: Seeks exemption identical to that being sought by North Dakota Aeronautics Commission.

20. PORTUGUESE EMBASSY

7-26-82: Extension of time.

21. OK AVIATION (BISMARCK, ND)

7-22-82: Opposed. "Utterly unconscionable."

22. RED AIRCRAFT SERVICE, INC. (FT. LAUDERDALE)

7-26-82: Same as Pompano Airways.

23. VIRGIN AIR

7-21-82: Strongly opposed. People will be unable to absorb costs.

24. IATA (FILED BY RODNEY WALLIS, DIR., FACILITATION & SECURITY)

7-19-82: Opposed. Disregard for economic environment.

25. RAA

7-26-82: Seeks exemption for operations with small aircraft. (Attached to RAA's comments is a copy of their comments filed with CAB in Docket 40673, "Regulatory Flexibility Act—Definition of Small Business," 7-27-82).

26. AIR FRANCE

7-23-82: Opposed. Customs Service does no service for the airlines. "User" of Customs Service is U.S. Government itself. International carriers and passengers shouldn't have to pay.

27. FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

7-22-82: Opposed. Carriers and passengers shouldn't pay; not beneficiaries of Customs services. Seeks exemption for German carriers.

28. AIR NIUGINI

7-12-82: Opposed. Airlines would suffer financial burden.

29. VIRGIN ISLANDS LEGISLATURE

7-13-82: Strongly opposed. Fees would hurt small carriers on which Islands rely.

30. SERVAIR ACCESSORIES, INC. (WILLISTON, ND)

7-13-82: SerVair is operator of small aircraft. Opposes Customs' proposed rule. Would suffer economic burden.

31. PILGRIM AIRLINES

7-12-82: Opposed. Will suffer severely and disproportionately.

32. IATA (HAMMARSKJOLD)

6-15-82: Opposed. Disregard for economic environment.

33. ATA

AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION,
Falls Church, Va., May 10, 1983.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The American Automobile Association is concerned over a provision contained in Sec. 114 of S. 519, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1983, which mandates the imposition of fees on aliens with respect to their use of Immigration and Naturalization Service border facilities and services, in order to offset the costs arising from the use of such facilities.

It is our understanding that, as written, this language would include international travelers in the definition of "aliens."

We wish to note our strong opposition to such fees. The fees proposed by Sec. 114 are not user fees; rather, they are a tax on aliens. Those who would be required to pay the tax would receive no benefit from it. In fact, there is really no relationship between border patrols and international travelers. Border facilities are maintained for the protection of U.S. citizens, not aliens. The fee proposed in Sec. 114 is therefore not a true user fee.

AAA has supported the concept of user fees in the past, most notably the federal gasoline tax to fund development of the Interstate system, and airline ticket taxes to help fund airport and airway development. Those who pay such taxes directly benefit from them.

Furthermore, the fee is discriminatory, because it would be imposed only on aliens, not U.S. citizens. No other country in the world, except the Philippines and Venezuela, imposes a tax similar to that proposed in Sec. 114. The Philippine tax is a head tax imposed only on those visitors whose stay in the country exceeds 59 days.

Moreover, a policy such as that contained in Sec. 114 conflicts directly with the policy set forth in Sec. 101(b)(3) of the National Tourism Policy Act which states: "There is established a national tourism policy to encourage the free and welcome entry of individuals traveling to the United States, in order to enhance international understanding and goodwill. . . ."

At a time when the U.S. is trying to encourage travel to this country from abroad, as well as encourage other countries to eliminate barriers to travel by U.S. citizens, a tax such as that proposed in Sec. 114 is unwise.

AAA urges you, as the sponsor of S. 529, to make clear during Senate consideration of this legislation that such fees are not intended to be imposed upon international travelers.

We appreciate any help you may provide on this matter and hope you feel free to call us if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

JOHN ARCHER,
Managing Director, Government Affairs.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, at this time I yield to my distinguished colleague from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, may I inquire, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) is the pending business.

AMENDMENT NO. 1270

(Purpose: To eliminate the provisions imposing fees for an alien's use of border facilities)

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be able to send an amendment to the desk and it be considered as a substitute amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) proposes an amendment numbered 1270.

On page 102, strike out "Sec. 114. Fees.".

On page 121, strike out all of section 114, line 4 to line 20.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. It would simply delete the fees section of the bill.

I offer this amendment for several reasons. First of all, I think it is fundamentally unsound for our country to begin imposing fees on travelers, who wish to come to America from other countries to enjoy vacations or transact business. We do not charge such fees now, and we should not begin doing it.

I have a particular interest in this issue because we in Montana enjoy a very cordial relationship with our neighboring country, Canada. There are three Canadian Provinces which border the State of Montana. Montanans have always been able to travel freely in Canada, and Canadians have likewise been able to travel freely in the Montana area and other States. I would hate to see Congress interfere with this friendly and cooperative relationship.

I also object to the fees provision on a general level. I do not think we should be sending a signal to the rest of the world that people coming to visit the United States will now have to pay a fee for that privilege. This is neither an acceptable precedent for the future not an acceptable departure from our traditions of the past.

Second, the language of the bill on the imposition of fees is so open-ended, so broad, and so vague that it gives authority to the executive branch of the Government to levy essentially any fee. The language says:

The Attorney General, after consultation with the Secretary of State, shall impose fees for aliens' use of border facilities or services of the INS in an amount necessary to make the total of such fees substantially equal to the cost of maintaining and operating such facilities and services.

Mr. President, that provision is broad enough to encompass almost anything. Under the proposed language, almost any cost having anything to do with the Immigration Service, could be and, in fact, must be, charged to foreigners who come to visit the United States. The provision of the bill is simply too broadly drawn.

Third, Mr. President, there has been virtually no focus on this provision of the bill. It has been raised in a very passive, tangential way in committee hearings, but I have no recollection in markup of any discussion about this issue. It is a small portion of a large bill, and it has been essentially unnoticed. But now that I have noticed it, I find its implications on our internal economic development and our external foreign relations profoundly disturbing. There are just too many questions that should be answered before we enact a provision that could affect so many areas of our lives.

I understand that the intention of this provision is to collect fees, to take a step toward balancing the budget.

It should be noted however, that the fees to be collected under this provision of the bill are not earmarked. They will not go to the INS but to the general fund of the Treasury. So the INS still has to come before the Congress, before the Appropriations Committee, to get their appropriations. The fees provision of the bill is not in reality going to help defray INS costs.

Finally, I just think the imposition of border fees is a bad idea. I can understand the reason that the provision is in the bill—to raise some money. But think of the precedent it will set. As soon as the United States starts taxing people who come to the United States to visit, on vacation or on business, other countries will start doing the same thing. A series of reciprocal and escalating fees will cause an unnecessary strain between the United States and foreign countries. For that reason, Mr. President, I think we should vote down this provision.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in response to my distinguished colleague from Montana, I wish to point out that the difference, of course, in our two amendments is that mine parallels identically the language in the House and is permissive in nature.

I share the sentiments of the Senator from Montana that this fee situation could be an impediment to tourism and daily commerce from Mexico and Canada.

It is for that reason that I selected a permissive approach to this issue, enabling the appropriate departments and agencies of the Federal Government to determine if, in fact, there is a means by which certain fees could be collected.

I am wondering if the Senator might consider the permissive aspect as curing the problem, primarily in his geographic area of the United States, and, if he would consider that satisfactory, perhaps joining me in this amendment?

Mr. BAUCUS. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; the question is this: Would the Senator consider a permissive approach, enabling the various departments and agencies of the Federal Government to try to collect some fees under circumstances that would not be injurious to the flow of people across our borders? Yet, it could be imposed on people coming for nontourist or business purposes.

Mr. BAUCUS. I understand the concern of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia wishes the Senator from Montana to modify the language in the pending bill so that it is similar to the House bill. At present, the Senate bill has mandatory language, requiring the administration to collect fees in amounts equal to operating services and facilities. The language of the House bill is discretionary.

Mr. President, I must answer the Senator from Virginia by saying I do not think that making the provision discretionary is an appropriate solution.

The State Department is in very strong opposition to any fees. So some agrue that if the State Department is opposed and the fees are made discretionary, no fees will be imposed. My response is that, if we all agree that no fees will be imposed anyway, why not just delete the fees provision from the bill?

Deleting the whole section makes our action absolutely clear to everyone—to the State Department, to Congress, to Americans, and to foreigners traveling to the United States—that this is no longer an issue, that there is no question, that no fees will be imposed.

The other problem is that the prepared discretionary language is just as open ended, just as broad, as the bill's original language. In either case, we have no way of knowing what we are getting into.

I suggest that, instead of legislating bad language, let us delete it and take it from there.

Mr. WARNER. I will defer to the sponsor of the bill to define the generic issue. Mine is the addition of the word "may."

It seems to me that we are faced with three alternatives: First, it is made mandatory by the pending bill. Second, I am making it discretionary. Third, the Senator from Montana wants to remove it altogether.

Considering those three positions, I think it appropriate at this time if we hear from the manager of the bill. In particular, I should like clarification of the administration's position.

I share the view expressed by the Senator from Montana; namely, that the Department of State is opposed. I am aware of that. I am also of the opinion that some other segments of the Federal Government are anxious to have the discretionary power to levy some fees.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that a few minutes ago, Senator WARNER and Senator BAUCUS were involved in this; and now I see that the ball is being fired at the plate, and I am behind the plate.

The issue is the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia which would remove the mandatory "shall" and make it a permissive, "may," and a substitute by the Senator from Montana which would simply repeal the user fee provision. That is where we are.

I will say just a very few things, because I want to get to the amendment by Senator BUMPERS and accommodate him, and I am sure we can accommodate him on the vote tomorrow, also. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina will have an objection to that.

The fees have been described as entry fees. Actually, they could be imposed either on entry or departure. They are user fees. The Senator from Montana is correct: Those funds are not earmarked. OMB vigorously opposed earmarking, although we did earmark application for legalization fees. But the provision was in the original bill in the 97th Congress. It was in the bill when it was introduced in the 98th Congress, and it had not been changed in the course of markup.

The State Department is less than enthusiastic; that is true. But both Congress and the Office of Management and Budget have been notoriously tightfisted with the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

The past inability of the INS to provide prompt and efficient service is notorious. Border enforcement and interior enforcement have been insufficient and ineffective.

I think Commissioner Allen Nelson is turning it around and is doing a very credible job.

I will conclude, and we can ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute tomorrow.

The committee's idea through the use of mandatory user fees was to provide funds to offset the cost of the facilities and services used by aliens crossing our borders.

Many countries do impose departure fees on persons leaving their borders. The provisions in the bill would permit the imposition of either an entry or a departure fee, whichever the administration deems the most appropriate.

The fees contemplated originally were small: Perhaps 25 cents per person at land crossings and around $1 per person at airports or seaports. That was the intent.

The approach is consistent with the present intention in Government, at least at some other levels to impose user fees, having the people who use the systems pay for the system. The income generated from those fees would improve the service which we furnish to people at the points of entry. The lines would be shortened and service improved through use of funds generated through the user fees.

At this juncture, I personally embrace the view of my colleague from Virginia. It matches the language of the House of Representatives making it permissive instead of mandatory, rather than repeal the fee provision. Maybe we could visit further about the issue of the land crossing fee versus an airport fee or a seaport fee. That is certainly something I would be willing to consider.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I respect my colleague from Montana. Had he not offered his amendment it is likely the manager of the bill would have accepted my amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana is accommodating the Senator from Virginia I would accept the amendment in the form of permissive rather than mandatory.

Mr. WARNER. So really the sole issue before the Senate then is to look at a permissive versus mandatory and the managers of the bill are prepared to accept the permissive approach.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct for this manager of the bill.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Montana for bringing this issue to the attention of the Senate.

This particular provision was in the legislation that passed last year.

There were members of the Judiciary Committee, including myself, who were concerned about it, so we inquired about it from the State Department. I must say they were remarkably slow in getting back to us with their own concerns.

Finally, as has been well-stated by the Senator from Montana, when they have reviewed it and reviewed it in very considerable detail, I think the Senator has understated the kind of anxiety they feel and their fear of the implications this provision will have—of the United States being the first country in the world that puts the tin cup out for people when they are coming into this country or coming back into this country. The implications of that I think are profound indeed. Myself, I think they are beneath the dignity of this Nation.

I think we are all familiar with the kinds of fees that have been established to date, the visa fees to pay for consular services, which are quite appropriate. Almost every nation in the world does it. There are the airport fees which we have seen in country after country. Nations do that. There are other kinds of generally accepted exit fees that take place.

If that were what was being intended by this particular provision in the bill, I would certainly hope that it would be sustained. But I think the Senator is quite correct that the language does not say that.

If the language remains as it is in the legislation, I can see not only the possibility of an Attorney General and the Immigration Service establishing an odious kind of process and procedure. I can see other countries establishing similar kinds of restrictions against U.S. citizens when they are traveling abroad. It does seem to me to be highly objectionable for the very sensible reasons the Senator from Montana has stated.

I would hope that over the period of the nighttime—prior to the time that we would vote on this measure—that we could work out a compromise, which would be sufficiently discretionary in terms of the future, but that we agree on what is acceptable and what is responsible and that there be a common understanding by the Members of the Senate exactly what this provision will actually mean.

I, too, am troubled by the discretionary provisions, but as I understand the comments of the Senator from Wyoming in the listing of the kinds of fees he thought would be included, they were the most traditional kinds of fees, and those I think have a general acceptance and understanding in international relations, and were we to come out in that particular way then I think that the Senator's objective would be accomplished. But if we are not able to reach that compromise, I would vote with the Senator from Montana on this amendment and I think he is quite correct.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. I am not going to take much more of the Senate's time here. We have other matters to attend to.

Let me say, first, that as I understand present law, the kind of matters, the Senator from Wyoming wishes to see covered are already covered. We do not need this provision for airport-type user fees and visa fees.

Second, the fees provision causes a problem because about one-sixth of our border crossings in the North are unmanned. Who is going to collect the fees as Canadians come across or as they go back across? There is no one there to collect them. They are small, remote stations. It is a minor matter, but if we have to have someone collect the fees, that in itself, is going to increase INS costs.

More fundamentally, I do not think imposing border fees is proper or right.

The Senator from Massachusetts says it is demeaning to the United States to start imposing fees on people who come to visit the United States. I agree. If we require these fees, the Statue of Liberty will thereafter be heard to say: "Give Me Your Tired, Your Poor and Your Buck." I do not think that is what we want the Statue of Liberty to represent.

Mr. President, I wish to yield the floor, and I do ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, Senator BAUCUS comes from a State immediately contiguous to me on the north. We, in that part of the world, are familiar with persons who are illegal undocumented workers from Canada. It is odd in these United States we do not always think of them in the same way we think of other illegal undocumented alien persons but, nevertheless, they are the same in every way.

We have vowed never to speak about the Statue of Liberty in this debate, and the Senator from Montana has strayed from the official ground rules and will be severely chastised at some later time.

Fees are now being assessed, as the Senator says, but they are not user fees. We were just trying to frame a user fee.

But I would hope the staffs might work this evening and maybe go on to address what Senator KENNEDY is saying with regard to the possibility of the designation of a user fee. But if not, the yeas and nays have been asked for and we will deal with the issue tomorrow. I think the case has been stated.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question needs to be resolved on the underlying Warner amendment.

Are the yeas and nays to be ordered on the underlying amendment?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I heard the question. Was there a sufficient second?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was on the Baucus substitute.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1271

(Purpose: To eliminate the investor preference)

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, is my amendment in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) proposes an amendment numbered 1271. On page 157, beginning with line 19, strike out all through page 158, line 6.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, there are 20 minutes on this amendment to be equally divided and as far as I am concerned, we can probably dispose of it even in less time than that. It is a very simple amendment.

I wish to explain to my colleagues a category included in this bill about which very little or nothing is being said.

No. 1, in the broad category of independent preference, that is a broad category, and under independent preference are four different classifications.

First, if there happens to be an Einstein somewhere wanting in this country, someone with exceptional ability, he can be admitted and he has high priority under this particular classification.

Second, anyone who has a skill that is needed in this country. It is just a skilled worker preference. He can be admitted.

They are the second priority within that classification.

The third one and the one to which I take exception is called investor preference. Before I tell you what investor preference means, Mr. President, let me make this point: In this broad classification, 75,000 people can be admitted into this country within those categories—exceptional ability, as I say, the kind of mind that Einstein might have, if it happens to be something we need. That is No. 1. Skilled workers are No. 2. Those who have money to invest in this country to start a business are No. 3. Out of the 75,000 people in those categories, only 7,500 can be admitted under the investor preference. That is not likely to happen, because here is the existing law.

It is not existing law; actually, it is just something the Attorney General set up in 1978, that anybody who had $40,000 and wanted to employ one person in this country could get in under the existing rule. It is not legislative, it is not a part of the immigration law, it is just something the Attorney General put in in 1978. Not one person has ever been admitted to the United States under that category, and I am glad.

But here comes this bill. This bill provides that anybody in this category who has $250,000 and wants to hire 10 people gets a preference.

AMENDMENT NO. 1270

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the Baucus amendment No. 1270. Five minutes is allowed for debate. Who yields time?

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, after consultation with the author of the substitute amendment, the Senator from Montana, and with the managers of the bill, I am prepared to indicate that I accept the substitute amendment to my amendment. Therefore, my amendment becomes the Baucus amendment and I join with the distinguished Senator from Montana. It is my understanding that the manager of the bill is prepared to accept it. In that case, Mr. President, I move that the yeas and nays be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On which amendment?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending to which the Senator from Montana has a substitute amendment. I am prepared to accept his substitute amendment, thereby vitiating my amendment. I join with the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAUCUS. Reserving the right to object, on which amendment is the Senator from Virginia having the rollcall vote vitiated?

Mr. WARNER. On both amendments.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I appreciate having the yeas and nays vitiated on the Warner amendment. However, I wish to retain the yeas and nays on the Baucus amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the Senator from Montana recognize that if this accommodation had been made as the Senator from Virginia has indicated, this side of the aisle will accept the amendment, agree to take it?

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. However, Mr. President, I believe the amendment to delete the fees provision is an important one. I would like to provide all my colleagues with the opportunity to go on record as supporting and reaffirming America's historical commitment to open border access. And therefore I would like to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I spoke in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Montana yesterday. I welcome the fact that the Senator from Wyoming has been as accommodating as he has been. I will be glad to vote for it. I would have voted for it yesterday. However, I will certainly give every assurance that in the conference we will make every effort to see that it is carried forward. With all due respect, I do not know that it will make a great deal of difference in the conference if we have a vote or not. If the Senator wants to pursue that, it is fine with me. I think it is a question of the Senator from Wyoming wanting to move ahead on the legislation that he made the request.

Mr. BAUCUS. I very much appreciate the views and support of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wyoming. I still believe however, that it would be beneficial to have a rollcall vote on the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, will the Chair review the status of this vote for the Members present?

Mr. KENNEDY. May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

If all time has been yielded back on the amendment, there will be a 10-minute rollcall vote.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask for a review of the status. We have now had Senator WARNER relinquishing his position and now we go back to the amendment of the Senator from Montana. Is that correct? The Senator from Virginia has joined the Senator from Montana as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would not change the parliamentary procedure. We would still vote on the Baucus amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be vitiated on the Warner amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. How much time remains, then? Is it 2½ minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute remains.

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me just say, Mr. President, that I appreciate the work the Senator from Virginia, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Montana have done with regard to this. I assure the Senator from Montana that I embrace what Senator KENNEDY has said about supporting the position in conference. He will have to test me to see if I do that. He will find that that will be so.

We intend to hold hearings on this issue of perhaps separating out seaports and airports, instead of a regular border point type of charge. We will look into that carefully. I will support the amendment.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wyoming. He has been very gracious in helping me on this amendment. I thank him for that assistance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI) is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 91, nays 3, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 93 Leg.]

So the amendment (No. 1270) was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NUMBER 1269, AS AMENDED

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Warner amendment (No. 1269), as amended.

The amendment (No. 1269), as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment (No. 593) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 594

(Purpose: To insert a new section heading)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] proposes an amendment numbered 594.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 68, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section heading:

SEC. 125. SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

AMENDMENT NO. 595 TO AMENDMENT NO. 594

(Purpose: To provide a seasonal agricultural worker program for employment in perishable commodities)

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] proposes an amendment numbered 595 to Amendment No. 594.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In the proposed amendment, strike out all after "SEC. 125." and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

(a) PROVIDING NEW "O" NONIMMIGRANT CLASSIFICATION FOR SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Section 101(a)(15) (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(15)), as amended by this Act, is further amended—

(1) by inserting "and other than seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities described in section 217(h)(1)" in subparagraph (H)(ii) after "section 216(h)(1)";

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (M);

(3) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (N) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or";

(4) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(O) an alien having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning who is coming to the United States to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1)).".

(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Chapter 2 of title II is amended by adding after section 216 the following new section:

"SEC. 217. ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.

"(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor, shall by regulation establish a program (hereafter in this section referred to as 'the program') for the admission into the United States of seasonal agricultural workers (as defined in section 217(h)(2).

"(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker (as defined in section 217(h)(2)) may not be approved by the Attorney General unless the petitioner certifies to the Attorney General the following:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYER IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—

"(A) NATURE OF PETITIONER.—The petitioner employs (or contracts for the employment of) individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities, or is an association representing such employers or contractors.

"(B) REQUIREMENTS OF PETITIONS.—For each month concerned and for each agricultural employment region (designated under section 217(i)(1)) in which the petitioner is operating, the petition must specify—

"(i) the total number and qualifications of individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities required in each month, and

"(ii) the type of agricultural work required to be performed by these workers.

"(2) WILL MAKE RECRUITING EFFORT.—The petitioner will make a good faith effort to recruit (as required by the Attorney General in regulations) in the area of intended employment, including the listing of employment opportunities with the appropriate office of a governmental employment service, and will accept for employment able, willing, and qualified workers referred by such office to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities until the commencement of the seasonal agricultural services for which the petitioner has recruited.

"(3) REPORT ON RECRUITMENT.—In the case of a petitioner that has employed seasonal agricultural workers during the previous 12 months, the petitioner will provide a summary of his efforts to recruit domestic workers to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities during that period.

"(4) ADEQUATE WORKING CONDITIONS.—The petitioner will provide such wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed.

"(5) HOUSING.—The petitioner will furnish housing for nonimmigrants described in section 101(a)(15)(O) or, at the petitioner's option and instead of arranging for suitable housing accommodations, will substitute payment of a reasonable housing allowance to the provider of the housing, but only if the housing is otherwise available within the approximate area of employment.

"(6) NOTICE TO ATTORNEY GENERAL OF EMPLOYMENT.—The petitioner will notify the Attorney General of the entering into, or termination, of an employment relationship with a seasonal agricultural worker not later than 72 hours of the time the relationship is entered into or terminated.

"(7) EMPLOYMENT ONLY IN SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ a seasonal agricultural worker for services other than seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(8) LIMITATION ON THE USE OF "O" WORKERS IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ (or petition for the employment) of a nonimmigrant in any job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(O) for seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities when an application for employment in that job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(N) is pending or approved.

"(9) JOB INFORMATION DISCLOSURE TO "O" WORKERS.—The petitioner shall, upon request, disclose in writing to seasonal agricultural workers when an offer of employment is made, the place of employment, the wage rates, the employer benefits to be provided, and any costs to be charged for each of them, the crops and kinds of activities for which the worker may be employed, and the anticipated period of employment.

"(c) SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION.—The Attorney General shall suspend a petitioner's certification under subsection (b) if any of the following conditions exits:

"(1) LABOR DISPUTE.—There is a strike or lockout in the course of a labor dispute which, under the regulations, precludes such certification.

"(2) VIOLATION OF TERM OF PREVIOUS CERTIFICATION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The employer at any time during the previous two-year period employed seasonal agricultural workers and the Attorney General has determined, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, that the employer at any time during that period—

"(i) substantially violated an essential term or condition of the labor certification under subsection (b) with respect to the employment of domestic or nonimmigrant workers, or

"(ii) has not paid any penalty for such violations which have been assessed by the Attorney General.

"(B) DISQUALIFICATION LIMITED TO ONE YEAR.—No employer may have its certification suspended under clause (A) for more than one year for any violation described in that clause.

"(3) NOT PROVIDING FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION.—The employer has not provided the Attorney General with satisfactory assurances that if the employment for which the certification is sought is not covered by State workers' compensation law, the employer will provide, at no cost to the worker, insurance covering injury and disease arising out of and in the course of the worker's employment which will provide benefits at least equal to those provided under the State workers' compensation law for comparable employment.

"(d) ROLES OF AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—

"(1) PERMITTING FILING BY AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker, and a labor certification with respect to such a worker, may be filed by an association representing seasonal agricultural employers which use agricultural services.

"(2) TREATMENT OF ASSOCIATIONS ACTING AS EMPLOYERS.—If such an association is a joint or sole employer of seasonal agricultural workers, the certifications obtained under this section by the association may be used for the job opportunities of any of its members requiring such workers to perform agricultural services of a seasonal nature for which the certifications were obtained.

"(3) TREATMENT OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) MEMBER'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY ASSOCIATION OR OTHER MEMBERS.—If an individual member of such an association is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the member, the suspension shall apply only to that member and does not apply to the association unless the Attorney General determines that the association or other member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(4) ASSOCIATION'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY MEMBERS.—If an association representing agricultural employers is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the association, the suspension shall apply only to the association and does not apply to any individual member of the association unless the Attorney General determines that the member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(e) EXPEDITED ADMINISTRATIVE APPEAL OF SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION UNDER SUBSECTION (c)(2).—

(1) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES.—The Attorney General shall provide for an expedited procedure for the review of a suspension of certification under subsection (c)(2) or, at the applicant's request, for a de novo administrative hearing respecting the suspension. In the case of a request for such a review or hearing, the Attorney General shall provide that the review or hearing take place not later than 72 hours after the time the request is submitted.

"(f) HEARING DE NOVO BEFORE THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT.—

"(1) JURISDICTION.—On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in the District of Columbia, has jurisdiction to enjoin the Attorney General from suspending the complainant's certification under the program and to order the reinstatement of complainant's certification if it is improperly suspended. In such a case, the court shall determine the matter de novo and the burden is on the Attorney General to sustain his suspension.

"(2) PRECEDENCE OF CASES.—Except as to cases the court considers of greater importance, proceedings before the district court, as authorized by this and appeals therefrom, take precedence on the docket over all cases and shall be assigned for hearing and trial or for argument at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) AUTHORITY.—The Attorney General is authorized to take such actions, including imposing appropriate penalties and seeking appropriate injunctive relief and specific performance of contractual obligations, as may be necessary to assure employer compliance with terms and conditions of employment under this section.

"(2) APPROPRIATE DOCUMENTATION.—The Attorney General shall provide for such endorsement of entry and exit documents of seasonal agricultural workers as may be necessary to carry out this section and to provide notice for purposes of section 274A.

"(3) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 214 and the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law regulating admissibility of nonimmigrant workers.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL SERVICES IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The term 'seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities' means services in agricultural employment including planting cultural practices, production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting involving perishable commodities (as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture).

"(2) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER.—The term 'seasonal agricultural worker' means a nonimmigrant described in section 101(a)(15)(O).

"(3) CARIBBEAN BASIN.—The terms 'Caribbean Basin' and 'Caribbean Basin Countries' include those countries eligible to be designated by the President as 'beneficiary countries' under section 212(b) of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2702(b)).

"(i) ESTABLISHMENT OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS BY AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—For purposes of the administration of the program the Attorney General shall designate not more than 10 agricultural employment regions within the United States. The entire United States shall be encompassed by the area of all such regions.

"(2) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS.—After considering the factors described in paragraph (3), if the Attorney General determines that seasonal agricultural workers are required for a month for an agricultural employment region, the Attorney General shall establish a numerical limitation on the number of nonimmigrant visas that may be issued for such workers for that month for that region.

"(3) FACTORS IN DETERMINATION.—In making the determination and establishing numerical limitations under paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall-

"(A) base the determination and limitations on petitions filed under section 217(b)(1),

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A), and

"(D) consult with the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(4) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS AFTER THREE YEARS.—The Attorney General shall estalish at the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, a numerical limit on the total number of seasonal agricultural workers to be admitted into all employment regions in the United States under the program at any given time. In establishing a numerical limit under this paragraph, the Attorney General shall—

"(A) consider petitions filed under section 217(b)(1) during the preceding years of the program,

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A),

"(D) consult with Secretary of Agriculture, and

"(E) consider the recommendation of the Commission on Agricultural Worker Programs on a numerical limit as provided under section 124(c)(5).

"(5) CHANGES IN NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS IN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—

"(A) INADEQUATE MONTHLY AND REGIONAL LIMITATIONS.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation has been established under paragraphs (2) or (4) for a region for a month, and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes that extraordinary and unusual circumstances have resulted in a significant change in the petitioner's need for seasonal agricultural workers specified in the petition or in the availability of domestic workers who are able, willing, and qualified to perform seasonal agricultural employment, the petitioner may apply to the Attorney General (in such form and manner as the Attorney General shall provide) for an increase in the numerical limitations otherwise established under paragraphs (2) and (4) to accommodate the circumstances.

"(B) DETERMINATION.—The Attorney General shall make a determination on such an application within 72 hours of the date the application is completed. To the extent the application is approved, the Attorney General shall provide for an appropriate increase in the appropriate monthly and regional numerical limitation. The Attorney General may expand the number of workers admitted into the region for which the application is approved by transferring seasonal agricultural workers from another region with a lesser need or by admitting additional workers from foreign countries. In the event the limit on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers for all regions in the United States established under paragraph (4) has been reached at the time the application alleging extraordinary and unusual circumstances is filed, the Attorney General shall follow the procedures in subparagraph (C).

"(C) INCREASE IN THE NUMERICAL LIMITATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers into all employment regions has been established by the Attorney General under paragraph (4) and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes under the provisions of subparagraphs (A) and (B) that extraordinary and unusual circumstances require an increase in the numerical limitation, the Attorney General may provide for an increase in the appropriate numerical limitation in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the total number authorized for admission into all regions. Any such increase authorized by the Attoreny General shall terminate upon the end of circumstances requiring it and shall not result in a permanent expansion of the numerical limit established by the Attorney General under paragraph (4).

"(j) ENTRY OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—

"(1) ANNUAL TIME LIMITATIONS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker under section 101(a)(15)(O) for a period of more than nine months in any calendar year. An alien admitted under section 101(a)(15)(O) during any calendar year will not be eligible for readmission into the United States until he has returned to his country of origin for a period of 3 months.

"(2) VIOLATORS DISQUALIFIED FOR 5 YEARS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker if the alien was admitted to the United States as such a worker within the previous five-year period and the alien during that period violated a term or condition of such a previous admission.

"(k) WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of Agriculture and Labor, shall establish through regulation appropriate wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed in the area of intended employment.

"(l) ALLOCATION AND USE OF VISAS UNDER THE PROGRAM.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Nonimmigrant visas for seasonal agricultural workers, within the numerical limitations established under subsection (i)(2), shall be made available as follows:

"(A) PREVIOUS WORKERS.—Visas shall first be made available to qualified nonimmigrants who have previously been admitted as seasonal agricultural workers and who have fully complied with the terms and conditions of any such previous admission, providing priority in consideration among such aliens in the order of the length of time in which they were so employed.

"(B) OTHERS.—Any remaining visas shall be made available to other qualified nonimmigrants.

"(C) TREATMENT OF SPOUSES AND CHILDREN.—A spouse or child of a seasonal agricultural worker is not entitled to a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker by virtue of such relationship, whether or not accompanying or following to join the nonimmigrant, but may be provided a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker if the spouse or child also is qualified as such a worker.

"(D) NO INDIVIDUAL EMPLOYER VISA PETITION REQUIRED.—An alien admitted pursuant to section 101(a)(15)(O) shall not be required to obtain any petition from any prospective employer within the United States in order to obtain a nonimmigrant visa under the program.

"(E) NO LIMITATION TO PARTICULAR EMPLOYER OR CROP.—A nonimmigrant visa issued under the program shall not limit the geographical area (other than by agricultural employment region) within which a seasonal agricultural worker may be employed or limit the type of seasonal agricultural employment services, in perishable commodities, the worker may perform.

"(F) DISQUALIFICATION FROM FEDERAL ASSISTANCE.—A seasonal agricultural worker under the program is not eligible for any program of financial assistance under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government.

"(G) ALLOCATION OF VISAS TO CARIBBEAN BASIN COUNTRIES.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Agriculture, shall establish through regulations the allocation of visas to workers in specific countries under this section. A percentage of the visas issued shall be allocated to qualified workers in countries located in the Caribbean Basin.

"(m) TRUST FUND FOR PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Attorney General shall establish by regulation a trust fund the purpose of which is to provide funds for the administration of the program and to provide a monetary incentive for seasonal agricultural workers in the program to return to their visas under the program. The Attorney General shall promulgate such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(2) PAYMENTS INTO TRUST FUND.—In the case of employment of a seasonal agricultural worker under the program—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENT.—The employer shall provide for payment into the trust fund established under this subsection of an amount equivalent to 11 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENT.—There shall be deducted from the wages of the nonimmigrant and paid into such trust fund an amount equivalent to 20 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(C) WAGES DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'wages' has the meaning given such term in section 3121(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, except that for these purposes paragraph (1) of that section shall not apply.

"(3) USE OF AMOUNTS IN TRUST FUND.—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENTS AND INTEREST.—Except as provided in paragraph (B), amounts paid into the trust fund, and interest thereon, shall be used for the purpose of administering the program.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENTS.—Amounts described in paragraph (B) paid into the trust fund with respect to a worker and interest thereon shall be paid to the worker if—

"(i) the worker applies for payment within 30 days of the last day of employment under the program (as verified by the Attorney General) at the United States consulate nearest the worker's residence in the country of origin, and

"(ii) the worker complies with the terms and conditions of the program, including the obligation to be continuously employed (or actively seeking employment) in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(4) EXPANSION OF CONSULATES.—The Secretary of State is authorized to take such steps as may be necessary in order to expand and establish consulates in foreign countries in which aliens are likely to apply for nonimmigrant status under the program.".

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101), as amended by sections 101(b) and 102(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(d) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF LABOR.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Labor for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, $10,000,000 for the purposes—

"(A) of recruiting domestic workers for temporary services which might otherwise be performed by seasonal agricultural workers described in section 217, and

"(B) of monitoring terms and conditions under which such temporary and seasonal agricultural workers (and domestic workers employed by the same employers) are employed in the United States.

"(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.—There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the Secretary's duties and responsibilities under section 217.".

(d) PROHIBITING ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—(1) Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)), as amended by sections 113(a) and 122(e)(1) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) An alien (other than an immediate relative specified in section 210(b)) who entered the United States classified as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(O).

(2) Section 248(1) (8 U.S.C. 1258(1)), as amended by section 122(e)(2), is further amended by striking out "(k) or (N)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(K), (N), or (O).".

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of this section apply to petitions and applications filed under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act on or after the first day of the twelfth month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act (hereafter in this section referred to as the "effective date").

(f) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall approve all regulations to be issued implementing sections 101(a)(15)(O) and 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, final regulations to implement such sections shall first be issued, on an interim or other basis, not later than the effective date.

(g) DEPORTATION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS FOR FAILURE TO BE EMPLOYED OR SEEK EMPLOYMENT.—Section 241(a) (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (19) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(20) entered the United States as nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(O) and failed to be continuously employed or actively seeking employment in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1) in accordance with the usual and customary employment patterns and practices.".

(h) SENSE OF CONGRESS RESPECTING ADVISORY COMMISSION.—It is the sense of Congress that the President should establish an advisory commission which shall consult with the Government of Mexico and the governments of other appropriate countries and advise the Attorney General regarding the operation of the seasonal agricultural worker program established under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(i) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 216, as added by section 122(h), the following new item:

"Sec. 217. Seasonal agricultural worker program.".

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the purpose of my amendment is to provide a seasonal agricultural worker program for employment in perishable commodities, the objective of which is consistent with those desired by the supporters of this immigration reform legislation.

Let me first say a word about my distinguished colleague from Wyoming. It is hardly necessary, even to newcomers to this body, to point out the distinguished history of the sponsor of this landmark legislation. This is an effort to deal with a problem of the right proportions, and he has dealt with it heroically. I may not agree on several points, but his legislative craftsmanship and the leadership he has taken in holding hearings and doing the background research necessary to even address this problem has to earn the commendation of those who may not agree with the product entirely. So he has my admiration and my respect.

Having said that, I wish to offer an amendment which I think is really necessary in order for any immigration reform legislation to become workable in a way that does not savage an important American industry.

As sponsor of S. 1200, to his credit he is attempting to restrict access to our borders through controls and deterrents.

Similarly, my amendment will achieve a federally regulated program of controlled access to and egress from our Nation's farms. The program would allow foreign workers to enter our country on a temporary basis to work only in perishable agriculture and only as a supplement to the small number of domestic workers available, which number has, through history, been grossly inadequate to the need for timely harvest of perishable commodities, and which promises to be grossly inadequate in the future. Temporary foreign workers are essential in order to ensure the timely harvest of the more than 200 different types of perishable agricultural commodities which are grown nationwide.

Not only is my amendment consistent with the laudable purposes of S. 1200, it is a program which deletes nothing from the committee's bill; rather, my amendment was drafted with the explicit purpose of supplementing the existing agriculturally related provisions of S. 1200—the so-called H-2 program.

While consistency of statutory purpose may be of interest to us as legislative drafters, it is of little concern to a farmer whose 50 acres of peaches ripened over an unexpectedly warm night and must be harvested by hand within 48 hours to assure maximum quality and price. It is of little significance to a woman dependent upon her job in a cannery, where thousands of her fellow employees are divided into three 8-hour shifts in order to can and process fresh fruits and vegetables within 24 hours of harvest. Similarly, statutory niceties are irrelevent to a trucker who will earn $5,000 hauling across the country a trailer loaded with 400 cartons of chilled iceberg lettuce or to the family whose dinner salad will be on their table within less than a week after its fresh ingredients ripened in the fields.

Yet, what we decide here, today, will have a profound impact upon their livelihood and lifestyle; because the issue before us will determine whether American farmers can continue to grow and harvest perishable agricultural commodities in the United States. Our Nation's current production of fresh fruits and vegetables is valued at $23 billion. A considerable portion of this is produced in my State.

I hasten to add that perishable crops are grown in every State. They are grown on more than 25,000 farms across this land. Ninety percent of those farms are small family farms of less than 200 acres. Unlike producers of wheat, corn, and other field grains, these farms are not large operations where mechanical harvesters can be used during peak harvest times. To the contrary, the vast majority of these fruits and vegetables must be harvested by hand, thereby requiring a large number of workers on very short notice. If S. 1200, in its present form, is effective in reducing the number of undocumented workers in this country, our farmers who grow perishable crops face a disconcerting choice, indeed, a destructive choice. They can either hire domestic workers if they are available and qualified, and historically they have not been; or, if they are not, their choice is to hire illegal, undocumented workers which, under the provisions of this legislaton, will subject them to the kind of penalties that threaten to drive them out of business. Or they can simply choose to lose their crop and go out of business.

Mr. President, that is not an acceptable choice; not in this Nation. In my view, a well-constructed immigration reform package should not force our growers to choose between hiring illegals or lose their crop or having to go out of business; especially at a time when American agriculture is reeling already from precipitate declines in land values, commodity prices, and export sales. Similarly, I do not believe that any U.S. Senator should be forced to vote for a law intended to address the critical national problem of illegal immigration at the expense of a significant segment of American agriculture and to the detriment of the hundreds of thousands of people throughout our land whose livelihood depends upon a workable program to ensure the timely harvest of perishable agriculture.

Mr. President, at some time, probably within a month, but at some time later this fall, this body will take up any number of proposals that have to do with trade. They have to do with the loss, Mr. President, the virtual hemorrhaging of American jobs offshore. It is no exaggeration to state that without this amendment, we face an additional hemorrhage within a narrow segment of perhaps America's basic industry, agriculture; because without the workable provisions that ensure a timely harvest, we will see farmers decline to subject themselves, their families, and their workers to the kinds of procedures that inevitably will drive them out of business.

My guess is that many of them will begin farming in other nations.

Mr. President, what that means, obviously, is not just that we will no longer see the growing and the harvesting of perishable commodities in this country. It means that all the collateral jobs in the packing sheds, in the processing plants, in the warehouses and the drayage sheds, in the trucks and in the retail markets—all of these jobs, at the very least, will suffer shrinkage and many of them will disappear entirely. It is no exaggeration to state that tens of thousands of jobs in my State alone hang in the balance on this vote. It is for that reason that I am offering this amendment.

While S. 1200 does contain modifications of the existing H-2 program, it is simply unrealistic to think that it can adequately address the unique and volatile harvesting needs of the growers of perishable crops. For example, S. 1200 would require a grower, in its streamlining of existing law, to predict in 65 rather than 80 days in advance of need to the Department of Labor the day upon which the farmer's crop will ripen and need to be harvested. In other words, Mr. President, existing law, which is a bureaucratic disaster, now requires the farmer to foretell the weather 80 days in advance of his need of those harvest hands. Is there anybody in here who wishes to wager with me on when the cherry blossoms will bloom?

How many times has the Cherry Blossom Festival been ignored by the blossoms? How many times in your lives have you seen weather predicitons be 180 degrees wrong? How many times have weather conditions created emergencies which man, unable to foresee, had to deal with as disasters?

Mr. President, farming is a risky business. Those who take their chances do so willingly, it is true. They do so knowingly. But, at the very least, they can expect or should be able to expect from their Government cooperation rather than well-intentioned obstacles that make it virtually impossible for them to perform this risky business of farming.

Not all farming is this risky, Mr. President. Not all agriculture is concerned with the growing of perishable commodities. But for those who have chosen this role for themselves, they do have a special need and it cannot be met by a bureaucratic requirement that they predict what is unpredictable, that they foretell what the weather will be.

And this is what happens if they are wrong. The Department of Labor officials attempt to produce the requested number of temporary workers on that magical 65th day.

But if warm weather hastens the ripening process by a day or a week, which is not uncommon, S. 1200 would force the grower to watch his crop slowly but irrevocably rot in the fields waiting for his H-2 workers to appear after the need on that magical 65th day, when the harvest should have occurred on the 59th. On the other hand, if an unexpected frost or a cooling period postpones the harvest for a day or a week or more, S. 1200 would require the grower to pay the idle H-2 workers until picking can commence. That is simply not feasible.

The fact of the matter is that these crops are ripe for harvest when climatic conditions allow them to be, not when the Secretary of Labor certifies them to be. Perhaps that is why the Department processes less than 20,000 H-2 workers each year, many of them to cut sugarcane, which is hardly considered a highly perishable crop; merely 20,000 H-2 workers each year, when USDA estimates that 2.9 million workers are annually employed in the fields.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. WILSON. I shall be happy to yield at the conclusion of the statement.

A current situation in the Fresno area is a representative case in point. Raisin growers in the heart of California's San Joaquin Valley are in the middle of their harvest, which usually lasts 5 to 6 weeks and requires a temporary work force of nearly 60,000 employees. With 45 percent of the raisin crop on the ground drying in the Sun, a highly irregular rainstorm recently disrupted the harvest, and the threat of more rain has postponed further picking. The work force has been temporarily laid off and has dispersed to other areas to harvest different commodities. This unforeseen and unforeseeable delay has lasted nearly a week; yet, at the first sign of sunshine, growers will scramble to reassemble a work force of 60,000 employees to pick the remaining 55 percent of the crop.

While this situation is a timely, and unfortunately disasterous, case in point, any of my colleagues who have even a passing familiarity with perishable commodities know full well that it is not an unusual, but a representative, one. My amendment will establish a regulatory framework that is flexible enough to accommodate these inescapable harvesting realities, while assuring that the Federal Government has adequate regulatory authority to ensure that participating growers and temporary workers comply with its terms.

Specifically, growers interested in participating in the program would file a petition with the Attorney General setting forth the number of workers that they will need on a month-by-month basis during the next 12-month period. In addition, these growers would certify to the Attorney General, in advance, that they will comply with specific requirements set forth in my amendment. These include explicit efforts to recruit and hire first domestic workers who are willing, able, and qualified to harvest perishable crops.

If the number of domestic workers is inadequate to meet the grower's harvesting needs, then the amendment would permit a participating grower to hire legal foreign workers, who have been issued temporary visas by the Attorney General for the specific purpose of providing a supplemental work force in perishable agricultural production. As under the H-2 provisions of S. 1200, growers would be required to pay an adverse effect wage rate as determined by the Department of Labor. What that means is they are required to pay a wage that assures they will not undercut the prevailing wage, which clearly is above the minimum wage. And I might add far above the minimum wage in many instances.

This is determined by the Department of Labor. Further, they are required to provide either housing or a reasonable housing allowance to the seasonal workers. The growers are further required to provide workers compensation or comparable insurance and to provide written notice of the terms and conditions of employment to the workers.

So that the Attorney General may closely monitor or track the movement of these legal foreign workers, the growers are further required to notify the Department of Justice within 72 hours after each worker either enters or leaves their employment. And in order that the workers have sufficient incentive to return to his or her country of origin, the growers are required to withhold 20 percent of gross wages, which is then escrowed with the U.S. Government. It is deposited in an escrow account in the worker's home country, and this money must be retrieved by the worker himself in person within 30 days after the expiration of his temporary visa or it wil be forfeited.

Let me underscore, it must be retrieved in person at the consulate in the country from which he was recruited.

Finally, participating growers will pay for the cost of the administration of this program by paying a user fee in an amount equal to 11 percent of the worker's gross wages to cover all administrative costs of the program. If any participating growers violate any of these requirements, my amendment authorizes the Attorney General to assess civil penalties and to suspend them from the program; that is, to make them ineligible to participate further in the employment of these seasonal foreign workers for a full year. That is a fact devastating to anybody in the business of annually producing perishable commodities.

Similarly, my amendment imposes explicit obligations on and provides specific protections for the legal foreign workers who will be admitted into our country temporarily. Eligible workers must be willing, able, and qualified to perform harvesting jobs. We are not seeking to recruit people for jobs other than the harvest of perishable commodities. That is the need, that is the purpose, it is the exclusive purpose for which they are admitted under this program. Their temporary visas restrict them to employment in perishable agriculture and they must remain continuously employed in perishable agriculture during the length of their visa or return to their country of origin within 30 days of their last job to receive the 20 percent of their wages which have been withheld. And remember, we know when they have left, because the workers' departure must be recorded by their employer within 72 hours of departure.

Workers who develop a record of compliance with the conditions of the program will receive priority consideration on future visa applications, but those who violate any of the terms will be ineligible to participate in the program for 5 years.

The amendment will not create an openended program as some of its critics mistakenly believe. On the contrary, my proposal directs the Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of Labor and Agriculture, to issue only the amount of temporary visas necessary to supplement the available domestic work force.

This decision will be made on a region-by-region basis every month, and then after 3 years of experience in administering the program the Attorney General is required to set a numerical cap on the maximum number of temporary foreign workers that can be allowed in our country at any one time.

Such explicit statutory authority and detailed regulatory controls as are included in this amendment were lacking entirely from the widely criticized Bracero Program which Congress terminated in the early 1960's. Also missing from the Bracero Program was adequate funding to enable Federal agencies to administer and enforce a program like this one. That is why my amendment assesses participating growers a user fee that the Congressional Budget Office estimates will generate twice as much money as will be necessary to administer the seasonal worker program.

In addition to the flaws that I have recited in the Bracero Program, there was a more significant and in my mind a more tragic omission. The Bracero Program was woefully inadequate in terms of affording worker protections. Today, Mr. President, when undocumented workers work illegally in this country, this sad situation of worker exploitation persists to some minor degree. We really cannot quantify it. The vast majority, I am convinced, of agriculture employers deal fairly with their employees, buy it is certainly true that the illegal status of these workers places them in a vulnerable position that subjects them to the possibility at least of cruel exploitation. To be certain, first of all, they are subject to the coercive and extortionate practices of the "coyotes," the smugglers, who charge them between $500 and $1,500 to smuggle them into this country and continue to threaten them with disclosure to the authorities. Similarly, the illegal worker has little in the way of recourse against unscrupulous employers. That has to change. A civilized society cannot tolerate the kind of thinking that has been going on because of this illegal status.

I do not believe that we should permit people within our midst to live in daily fear without recourse, and this amendment provides the legal temporary worker with specific protections and recourses. Specifically it assures them an adverse effect wage rate so that they cannot be paid slave wages, it assures them adequate housing or an adequate housing allowance, it assures them workers compensation, it allows them to join unions and to move freely from one grower to another within a specific geographic region if they are attracted by higher wages or if there exists a need for them to escape from unfavorable working conditions.

In conclusion, the adoption of my amendment will benefit farmers, workers, and consumers. It will preserve a virtal sector of American agriculture and thousands, tens of thousands of related jobs, the jobs in the packing sheds, in the processing plants, the jobs of truck drivers, the jobs of retail and wholesale grocers, jobs both union and nonunion. And I say to those whose concern has been stated that it will enhance, not diminish, the effectiveness of S. 1200 because it is entirely consistent with the stated goals of this legislation, and it will not cost the American taxpayer a single cent.

For these reasons, it is hardly the killer amendment that some unreasonable critics have so sought to characterize it. It is, in fact, a saving amendment, one that will save an industry and save American jobs and supplement the wages of foreign seasonal workers.

This amendment is cosponsored by Senators SYMMS, GRAMM, HATCH, MCCLURE, ARMSTRONG, EVANS, and GORTON.

I respectfully urge that all my colleagues support this amendment. It has been very carefully crafted to respond to the concerns not only of the sponsors of the amendment, but also those who support it, those who have voiced fears that migrant farmworkers will not stay migrant farmworkers, will slip out of that system and become steamfitters or factory workers.

This amendment goes about as far as it is possible to go to accommodate the goals of basic legislation and to save a vital industry that otherwise will be lost to America.

What we are talking about in our definition of the workers involved in perishable agriculture is limited to those who will be involved in the actual cultivation and harvest.

Specifically, we are amending page 11, line 20, by striking "as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, at 29 U.S.C. 203, subparagraph (f)" and inserting in lieu thereof the following language: "including planting, cultural practices, production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting." It does not seek to include those in the packing sheds, those processing, those trucking, those in the chain of distribution and marketing.

Mr. President, there are others who wish to speak on this amendment, and at this time I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCONNELL). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would feel remiss, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, if I did not express my regard for the distinguished Senator from Wyoming and the effort he has put into this particular legislative effort over the last three Congresses. I think Senator SIMPSON has done a remarkable job. He has been very patient. He has been thoughtful. He has been restrained. He has helped every Senator who had any concern about this matter. He has paid attention to the arguments and is doing the country a great service in helping us solve problems which are important to our country and which may be resolved by certain aspects of this bill which he has brought to the floor.

I have a great deal of respect for Senator SIMPSON and the effort he has put forth, not only on this issue but many others as well in Congress.

Having said that, I rise in support of the Wilson amendment. I do so because during the current debate on S. 1200, which is the third effort in recent years to reform our national immigration laws, the adoption of a viable seasonal workers program to meet the basic needs of the producers of perishable farm commodities should not be overlooked. This applies not only to the Western States but to States all over the Union as well.

This country cannot afford to attempt immigration reform, while ignoring the vital interests of small farmers who produce our agricultural necessities, including reasonably priced, high quality, fresh fruits and vegetables. Current perishable crop production is estimated to be worth nearly $23 billion. If these crops are not harvested and packed within a very short time during the harvest season, they will be lost to both the producers and to the American consumer.

Most producers who cultivate perishable commodities are small farmers who are susceptible to serious crop losses which can occur under the inflexible and restrictive H-2 provisions of S. 1200. Without the flexibility and the protections offered by the Wilson amendment, many of the perishable growers may be forced out of business or may be forced to shift their production to nonperishable crops which are capable of being mechanically harvested. In light of the massive surpluses currently produced by wheat, corn, and soybean farmers, I believe the last thing Congress wants to do is to discourage perishable fruit farmers by unrealistic immigration restrictions. The alternative may be for them to enter other flooded agriculture markets—that is, if they are capable, or if they have the capacity to do so; and that is easier said than done.

Were this to happen, distribution and transportation workers would be hurt because there would be fewer crops to distribute. Grocers and food suppliers would be lacking quality products to sell, and their business would suffer accordingly. Restaurants would have difficulty in obtaining fresh fruits and vegetables to serve to their customers. But, most important, the American consumer would find it difficult to obtain some of this Nation's most valued food products and will pay higher prices from those perishable commodities able to find their way to the marketplace.

If S. 1200 is not amended with respect to the seasonal workers' provisions, this country's perishable crop growers will have to decide between hiring undocumented, and probably illegal workers, or losing their crops. A well-balanced immigration reform package should not force perishable crop farmers to make that choice.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to support the Wilson seasonal foreign worker amendment as a necessary and vital protection of a major agricultural industry. Consumers will benefit, as well as the national interest, by avoiding a severe escalation in the cost of fruits and vegetables. This protection, provided by the Wilson amendment, will guarantee a balanced approach to the needs of perishable crop farmers and the needs of the Nation.

The Wilson amendment will protect domestic workers. It will protect foreign workers. It will also insure that foreign workers, who participate in the seasonal worker program, will return to their native countries upon the expiration of their visas. It will make temporary, legal immigration more attractive to foreign seasonal workers and will make permanent, illegal entry into the United States less attractive. I ask the support of my colleagues in adopting this amendment, which will benefit the farmer, the consumer, and the country as a whole.

Mr. President, I appreciate the efforts of the distinguished Senator from California in leading this battle, because I do believe it is a correct amendment that will help, in the final analysis, to pass an immigration bill. At least, that is my hope, and I commend the distinguished Senator from California for his efforts.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do appreciate the remarks of the Senator from California. I regret that I was interrupted with other business at the time of the presentation of his remarks. They rang very authentically.

I have come to know the Senator from California as a delightful personal friend. He and his wife, Gail, are great additions to this place, and I thank him for that.

My good neighbor from Utah and I have shared some spirited times together. He is a delightful and zealous advocate of his position, and I always admire the way he scraps for the things he believes in.

I see my good colleague from Idaho in the Chamber. We westerners usually stick together, but I want to say that we are sticking together if we accept the provisions in S. 1200.

I could not agree with my colleagues more that agriculture, especially perishable commodities, has some very special needs. There is not any question about that. If I did not recognize that I could never have come this far with this legislation because I represent a Western State, an agriculture-oriented State, a State heavy in beef cattle, wheat, corn, sugar beets, honey, wool, many of the things that we depend on in this country in agriculture. Wool is very important to Wyoming. We produce a great deal of the American lamb and beef in this country.

And we have in agriculture in Wyoming, just as we have in agriculture all over the United States, a great number of illegal undocumented persons who work in agriculture. Anyone who is not seeing that is missing the whole issue here. That is very simple. If you cannot save on interest, machinery, feed, or any other place, there is only one place you do save and that is with illegal undocumented workers. I recognize that. Everyone recognizes that.

I think what we fail to recognize is that we are trying to pass a piece of legislation on immigration reform which has to do with the entire country, and it is immigration reform for the United States of America. It is not for the West, it is not for the East or the South or North. It is for the United States of America.

I think there is the strangest figure you will come in immigration. I think people have a vision that everyone who is an illegal immigrant is someone who is working in agriculture with a hoe on the ground or weeding, working the beet fields or whatever. That is a great diversion from fact because only 8 to 15 percent of illegal undocumented persons work in agriculture. No one has ever given us any different figures on the select commission or in this body or in testimony. Only 8 to 15 percent of the illegal undocumented persons work in agriculture. The remainder of them work everywhere in the United States, assembly lines, service industries, you name it. Many of them for more than the minimum wage, indeed, as Senator WILSON says, and many more than the minimum wage in agriculture.

So there could not be anyone who would agree more that agriculture, especially perishable commodities, has some very special needs. What I really do disagree with is the viewpoint that S. 1200 does not adequately deal with those needs. That has been one of the things I have spent a great deal of time on to assure that S. 1200 does deal with the needs of agriculture and provisionally and especially, if you may, Western agriculture because I tell you what we do in S. 1200. You must be aware that we have not, as Senator WILSON says, ignored Western agriculture and indeed here is what we do just briefly. It will not take a moment to review that for you. The bill, S. 1200, provides this. I hope you hear this carefully. It provides expedited procedures that are available under the following circumstances. Here they are: they are available when labor certification is denied for workers that are needed in perishable commodities. They are expedited when U.S. workers might show up for work and are not able, willing, and qualified to get expedited procedures. You get expedited procedures under S. 1200 when the U.S. workers fail to show up as promised. You get expedited procedures when a grower faces a critical need for workers due to unforeseen circumstances such as unexpected changes in the weather occurring within 3 days of need.

Under those circumstances the Government agency involved, and that is either the Department of Labor or the Attorney General, depending on the situation, have to respond under S. 1200 within 72 hours.

Also under the H-2 streamlining in S. 1200 we give the Attorney General instead of the Department of Labor the regulatory control over the program. I do not know anyone in agriculture, West or East, who has not had vexing problems with the fact that the regulatory control of the program would often be within the Department of Labor. The regulatory control of the program under S. 1200 will have the Attorney General in consultation with the Department of Labor and the Department of Agriculture making the decisions on the regulatory issues.

We will also still have the Department of Labor in the certification process but the certification process will be limited to the adverse wage test and the availability of workers in distress to other American workers.

We have deleted the current requirement that unemployed workers anywhere in the United States be considered as being eligible domestic agricultural workers. That got very heavy-handed going through original certification, large certifications, certifications throughout the country. We have accepted this current requirement that they be from anywhere in the country. We have pulled it into closer regions.

We have reduced application deadline to 65 days before the date of need. That is in S. 1200. We demand that and require that the Department of Labor respond to the initial applications for foreign workers within specific time periods or else the labor standards will be presumed to have been met. That is in S. 1200. We allow foreign workers to be given a housing deposit in lieu of the farmer providing the housing. That is in S. 1200. We clarify, and this is very important, the nature of the joint liability of the agricultural associations and their individual members in order, then, that labor certifications might be more efficiently and swiftly processed.

In addition, and I think this is key and we will go into it further, we deviate from this bill momentarily to go into an item revisited, which we will do soon, but here is what we have done for the perishable commodity people: We created three brand-new and distinct 72-hour emergency application procedures for foreign workers when climatic changes cause a change in the harvest date, when U.S. workers might show up but are not qualified and when U.S. workers fail to show up as promised. We did that in S. 1200.

We also then allowed those workers to remain in this country for a brief period of time after they have completed their work contract in order that they may swiftly respond to farmers who are facing a 72-hour or shorter need for workers.

I honestly do not know what more we could have done to meet the needs of Western growers, including those with perishable crops. I say to you, and I do not do it to bait or to be contentious, I honestly do not know what more I could have done to accommodate the needs of Western perishable fruit growers.

Nothing I have ever done is enough. It never has been. They have told me as the bill would leave the Senate, "I guess that is OK," and then go to work with pretty heavy equipment—they do better heavy lifting than I ever do—and then they go right to work again.

I do not know where honestly, and I mean that, it could be unless, of course, where it is with this amendment and that is an open-ended guest worker program. I can tell you that.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. No. I would like to finish my remarks if I may.

I tell you that I have always been opposed to an open-ended guest worker program. I think that they repeat the most serious errors we have ever made in immigration policy that were made in the past without question.

I really know how a person from California has to feel when they are dealing with immigration reform. They cannot possibly win. You cannot possibly withstand the schism and the rips and the riptides that go with it. You cannot vote for immigration reform. This is the issue.

I would love to accommodate my friend from California in many ways, or the other Senator from California, who is just as remarkable a person here. And if I did and did and did, they would still never vote for this bill. Please do not miss that curious part of this ritual.

We can amend and amend and amend, but this bill will never be acceptable to them, as far as I know, at least it never has been. And I understand that, because they are torn by the growers and the unions and the employers and the Hispanics, and I would hate to be in that. That is why the issue gets to be played with only by Senators from Wyoming and Congressmen from Kentucky. Because you get ripped apart by your constituencies when you mess with immigration reform because it deals with guilt, fear, and racism. It does not make it any more fun, but I understand that. That is why I even have more respect for the Senator from California.

But I happen to live in a community where they had the bracero program. I watched that. I did a lot of pro bono work for people who were on the bracero program, as they came in and told me how their gas tank had been filled with sawdust and how the car dealer really gave them a good deal and how, just as they were getting ready to head back to Mexico, they were told they had forgotten to pay the $400-a-month rent for the little shack at the end of the field. I have been there. That was called the bracero program. It ended in a rather repugnant kind of an operation called operation wetback. That is how it ended.

Operation wetback was an expulsion of people who were here in the United States under a program which I hear referred to occasionally as something that worked, and I think it did not work. I was, I must say, offended by it. That was operation wetback.

That is what happens. That is what we got out of that, the last bracero program. Because we admitted large numbers of foreign workers to the United States without searching for U.S. workers. We assured that the wages offered would hopefully not affect U.S. workers' wages. But that did not work.

In this particular amendment, we are trying to say that this will not occur and that comes even before the foreign workers are admitted.

So I think the amendment—and I say this as precisely as I can—I think that what the amendment does really is legalize the status quo of illegal labor in agriculture. In my opinion, that is not immigration reform, because I do not believe that simply by referring to every illegal alien as legal that that constitutes immigration reform.

This seasonal program is exceedingly broad. I hear the Senator referring to it and I am very pleased to hear this because I gather that part of this proposal is an amendment to correct what I saw and did foresee as a glaring weakness, because the seasonal program here, as originally proposed, was extraordinarily broad. It not only provided for harvest labor, it provided also work in handling, planting, drying, packing, packaging, freezing, storing, and delivering to market. And I submit to you that those jobs, even if you want to fall for the argument—many do—that these people all do work that no U.S. citizen will ever do, I can tell you that U.S. citizens are the ones that write me the letters about immigration reform. Many of them are U.S. American Hispanic citizens of the United States who write me those letters and say, "What are you going to do about this situation? I am the one most directly affected. It is me and my family that are most affected by illegal, undocumented persons. I am a U.S. citizen; a minority, but a U.S. citizen."

I can assure you—and I appreciate the Senator's sensitivity to this—that those jobs that I have described indeed are clamored for by U.S. citizens. Those jobs in drying, and packing, and packaging, and processing, and freezing, and storing, and delivering to market. Those are jobs that American citizens do take. I appreciate the Senator's recognition of that, indeed.

Those activities that have to do with time sensitive issues, as I say, under S. 1200, we have tried desperately to recognize the problems of the perishable fruit industry. And, why not? Because they are persuasive, they are important, and they are a critical part of this national debate.

So I tell you that those activities that I describe which are not time sensitive, such as drying the figs and what needs to be done within hours—and I do understand that—those, indeed, are attractive things to U.S. workers. And we do not want to cut into that in any way.

There are three other things in S. 1200, and you must not miss this in the debate. We have streamlined and revised the H-2 Program. We have also put together a 3-year transition program.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. No, I will not yield at this time.

We have also established an Agricultural Labor Commission to examine the temporary agricultural worker issue and report to Congress. We have a conference report on this, a thorough conference report in this area. It was indeed a critical and 10-day report.

We had a thorough conference on this area and went through this entire area very clearly, especially with what was known as the Panetta-Morrison proposal. And, indeed, when LEON PANETTA and SID MORRISON joined forces, they put together a very extraordinary and formidably acceptable piece of legislation.

In the conference committee, we then revised it. We came up with a different hybrid, if you will, of Panetta-Morrison, agriculture-labor, meeting the needs of temporary work for those in the perishable and other areas of agriculture. We came up with a proposal, which is S. 1200.

S. 1200 is a direct distillation of everything we did in conference with regard to agriculture. I do not know how we could have reached a more appropriate view. And I know we are on the right track because organized labor is after me and so are the growers. So I know that, as long as the growers are not satisfied and labor is not satified, we must be awfully close to something that might be appropriate. And that is what is in S. 1200. Because, under that, we put the Attorney General in charge of a program. We require the Department of Labor to respond to employers in a specific period of time. We accommodate all emergency labor needs within a 72-hour certification process. This is all in S. 1200.

We allow the H-2 workers to remain in the country for emergency situations. And we allow agricultural associations, the very key to labor certification to be more easily formed.

The bill also provides for a 3-year transition program, which allows growers to use in the first year after enactment 100 percent of their need for nondomestic, seasonal, agricultural workers—which in practice would be determined with reference to growers' prior year's illegal work force. In other words, under the 3-year transition for the first year you can use 100-percent illegal workers, if that is what you wish to do. Please do not forget that this legislation, if passed, has nothing to do with the people you presently have hired. This whole legislation triggers in when you come to new hire. If you have a whole work force of illegal, undocumented persons, this legislation does not affect them. It is only when you go to new hire that that indeed becomes effective.

So we have a 3-year program for people to use, a 3-year transition, and a 100-percent use of prior years' illegal work force for the first year, 67 percent of that work force in the second year, and 33 percent in the third year.

The Agricultural Commission must study and report within 2½ years, while the growers are still able to use 67 percent of their illegal work force.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2:30 p.m. having arrived, under the previous order, the clerk will report the motion to invoke cloture.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the Conference Report on H.R. 1460, The Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985.

Edward M. Kennedy, Paul Simon, John D. Rockefeller IV, Bill Proxmire, John F. Kerry, Spark M. Matsunaga, Max Baucus, George J. Mitchell, David Pryor, John Melcher, Gary Hart, Howard M. Metzenbaum, Lawton Chiles, Dale Bumpers, Don W. Riegle, Jr., Alan J. Dixon, J. James Exon, Patrick J. Leahy, Claiborne Pell, and Alan Cranston.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, for the purpose of debate only, that each side have 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, earlier this week, on Tuesday, the supporters of this legislation attempted to file a cloture petition so that we could have a third cloture vote on the Anti-Apartheid Act. It is a tradition, as long as I have been in the Senate, that if an increasing number of Senators vote in support of successive cloture petitions, the leadership continues to permit further cloture votes. We have often had three, or even four, cloture votes on an issue, so long as the supporters of cloture are making progress. We had 53 votes for cloture on the Anti-Apartheid Act on Monday, and 57 votes for cloture on Wednesday. It was entirely reasonable for us to expect a third cloture vote today, but the Republican leadership is denying us that opportunity.

The pending cloture vote is entirely meaningless. It is not a valid test of support for the anti-apartheid vote, because it is not a cloture vote on the act, but on a motion to proceed to the consideration of the act. And that makes all the difference. So far, the Republican majority leader has used the rules to block us from filing a cloture petition to obtain a third cloture vote on the act.

Oh yes, he is willing to permit this meaningless cloture vote on the motion to proceed. Who wouldn't? You don't need cloture to get a final vote or a motion to proceed to a conference report. The motion is already privileged. It is nondebatable. Cloture in this situation is redundant and meaningless. It is procedural cloture, not substantive cloture.

Since the majority leader refuses to give us the third substantive cloture vote we seek, I urge my colleagues who support the Anti-Apartheid Act not to be fooled by this cheap imitation, and to vote no on cloture to demonstrate our opposition to this meaningless tactic.

Members of the Senate who voted for cloture on the substance of the Anti-Apartheid Act should vote no on this unfortunate maneuver. The Senate and the country should be under no illusion that this is a serious vote on apartheid in South Africa. It is nothing of the kind.

So I renew my request now to the majority leader. Will we have the opportunity for a third cloture vote on the Anti-Apartheid Act, and follow the time-honored tradition of the Senate to permit such a vote.?I11I ask the majority leader if he will make that request at this time.

Mr. DOLE. Me?

Mr. KENNEDY. That's you. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLE. We have already had three votes. This is going to be the fourth vote. I do not know why we need five votes. If we do not get this settled, they are making so much progress in South Africa since the President made his announcement there may not be any need to vote on it. I noticed today's headline is "More Improvement in South Africa," with reference to past regulations. So I think the President's announcement has had an impact already. I know that others would like to take credit for whatever may happen. But my view is we ought to be putting pressure on South Africa. I hope we can have this vote, and that would be four. And that ought to be sufficient. Obviously, there are ways Senators can have additional votes by offering the entire measure, or amendments to the immigration bill or debt ceiling. But I hope we still would have some opportunity to agree as we have in the past on this issue, bipartisan agreement, that sometime in the future, if there has been any retrenchment at all by the administration, I would call up the conference report. I am willing to make an agreement along those lines. I am not certain that we should have additional cloture votes. I would be happy to discuss that with the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we have only had two cloture votes so far on the merits. We had a procedural vote yesterday, and we are about to have another procedural vote today. That vote will be meaningless. Clearly we will not be able to obtain the real cloture vote we want, and I urge those who supported cloture on the Anti-Apartheid Act to vote no on this vote.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader allow an additional 15 seconds?

Mr. DOLE. For a statement?

Mr. BYRD. For a question.

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader ask unanimous consent that it be in order to order the yeas and nays on the conference report at such time as it is before the Senate?

Mr. DOLE. I would rather not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRD. I know the Senator would rather not. Would he do it? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLE. Can I think about it?

Mr. BYRD. Think about it.

Mr. DOLE. During the vote.

Mr. BYRD. You want to do that during the vote?

Mr. DOLE. Let me see how this vote comes out.

Mr. BYRD. All right. That is fair.

Mr. DOLE. I have not foreclosed it.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I am a little groggy. I had a little surgery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the quorum call has been waived. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 1460 shall be brought to a close?

The yeas and nays are required. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 88, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

East

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 11, the nays are 88. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is not agreed to.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I announce to my colleagues that the Secretary of State, Mr. Shultz, is in room S-407, where he will be giving a very important briefing to all Senators concerning an overview of American policy. That briefing was to have started at 3 o'clock, but obviously it has been delayed for about 10 or 15 minutes.

I also indicate that I have discussed with the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator SIMPSON, what we might expect today and tomorrow. He indicates that things will probably move fairly quickly once the pending amendment is disposed of.

I hope to consult with the distinguished minority leader within the next 45 minutes to an hour. I am advised that this legislation could be completed easily tomorrow. I am not certain what that may do to schedules of some Senators, but I will check with the distinguished minority leader and will check on this side. It probably could be completed late this evening; but, again, I will leave that up to the distinguished manager of the bill.

Also, I indicate at this time that I think we can reach a time agreement on the amendment to be offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY]. I am advised by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator GOLDWATER, that he would be agreeable to a 3-hour time agreement, the time to be equally divided on the amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Chair advise me as to the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). The pending business is amendment No. 595 to S. 1200, the immigration bill.

Mr. DECONCINI. Is that the amendment of the Senator from California?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

ANTIAPARTHEID CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. DECONCINI. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon for the interruption.

Mr. DECONCINI. I am glad to yield to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. DECONCINI. No; I prefer not to yield the floor. I yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend.

I ask the distinguished majority leader if he would be agreeable to a unanimous-consent request to let it be in order to order the yeas and nays on the conference report.

Mr. DOLE. No; I have considered that during the vote and I would be constrained to object to that request. But I would be willing, as I have indicated earlier, to discuss some agreement with the distinguished minority leader and the Senator from Massachusetts. I am also advised the distinguished chairman of the Committee now has the papers.

Mr. BYRD. He does?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. I continue to yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the taking of the papers from the desk by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. LUGAR, makes it impossible now for any Senator to move to proceed to the consideration of the conference report. That is the effect of his having taken possession of the papers. I am sorry that has occurred.

I would hope that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR] would think a little further about this and not deny the right of his colleagues, anyone of whom may wish to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DECONCINI. I am glad to yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, does the Senator from West Virginia find this to be an extraordinary procedure? The majority leader and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee are evidently so unsure of their own position on the Anti-Apartheid Act that they now resort to this kind of tactic—a single individual Senator, removing the papers from the desk of the Senate, and unilaterally and arbitrarily denying the Senate the right to act. We have 100 Senators in this body—how can 1 or 2 Senators make the judgment that the remainder of us are to be denied the opportunity for a further vote?

Can the Senator cite a single precedent for the extraordinary tactic we have just witnessed?

Mr. BYRD. I do not recall a precedent for the tactic. I cannot say with certitude that that is the case, but I do not recall its having been done before. It can be done, obviously, and this was the reason that I was trying to get the yeas and nays ordered on the conference report so that those papers could not be removed from the desk.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the papers are at the desk, as the Senator has pointed out, any Senator, acting on his own, has the right to move that the legislation be put before the Senate and ask for a vote on the motion. The motion is nondebatable. It cannot be filibustered. A majority of the Members of the Senate could vote for the motion and put the bill before the Senate. Those are the Senate rules. How can a single Senator simply take the papers from the desk and walk away with them?

This is an extraordinary action. Obviously, those who have resorted to it do not believe that they can win on the merits and therefore they use this extraordinary tactic. I think it is regrettable. It diminishes the Senate as a legislative body and as a body that should have the right and the opportunity to debate the public policy questions of our time.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. I continue to yield to the minority leader without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am not privy to information that the distinguished majority leader had anything to do with this. But the chairman of the committee, Mr. LUGAR, has done it. It can, of course, be done as we have just seen. As I say I do not recall its having been done during my tenure here. But I cannot be absolutely sure that that is the case.

I would hope that the distinguished Senator from Indiana would return the papers to the desk so that any Senator on either side of the aisle may exercise his right under the rules to move to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. DOLE addressed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor. He is not empowered to yield except for a question to himself without unanimous consent.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, this is a very important subject matter and I think it is important that it be given even precedence over what I am going to say here, although I have to tell you this is a great statement I pay attention to. Nevertheless, I ask unanimous consent that the Senators involved in this effort have 3 minutes and then the floor return to me at that period of time and if that is agreed to I will sit down for 3 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. And yield half of it to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DECONCINI. Divide it between the two leaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, under the Constitution, the President has a pocket veto power. But I know of nothing that gives the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee the pocket veto power.

Would the Senator from West Virginia agree with me that this is the effect of this kind of extraordinary, unusual behavior?

Mr. BYRD. I think that is the logical construction of the effect of the taking of the papers from the desk.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not know where we determined this was appropriate, but I think we checked with the Parliamentarian and we found precedents for it in other administrations in the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator state when, where, under what circumstances, and by whom that was done?

Mr. DOLE. We are still doing that research.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DOLE. We are prepared, as I indicated a number of times, and I am not suggesting we may not work out even another vote at the appropriate time, but it seems to me that at this point we ought to get on with the immigration bill. I will however confess to knowing about the removal of the papers and even helping locate the papers.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, is there anything remaining of the 3 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator on that side has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will he yield 1 minute?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope that the papers will be returned. This tactic is beneath the dignity of the Senate. We can make light at this moment about this particular procedure, but it affects the substance of one of the most important public policy questions that this body will address. And it affects in a very real way the interest of people not only in South Africa but in this country as well.

I would certainly urge the majority leader and members of the Foreign Relations Committee to reverse this trickery and this abuse of the Senate rules, and give this body an opportunity to consider this important question.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I could ask the majority leader a question regarding the schedule for the remainder of the day.

Mr. DOLE. Could I respond first?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it has been suggested by some in this body that any Senator has the right to move to proceed to a legislative item. While there is no specific rule to deny this, the weight of precedence and accustomed practice of the Senate is certainly otherwise.

It is a bit unusual, as I understand it, looking at the precedents and Dr. Riddick's comments for anyone else to try to set the agenda on moving to call up a conference report but that was done and no one complained on our side.

I would like to take this opportunity to again place in the RECORD a description of prerogatives of the leadership.

Among the leadership prerogatives which are customarily reserved for the majority leader or his designee and certainly one of the most important is that of setting the agenda for the Senate. While the Senate decides for itself how long it will spend considering any legislative matter, the majority leader determines what matters will be considered through the use of the motion to proceed. This has only been rarely challenged and it is even more rare for the challenge to succeed. A history of this role and how it developed is contained in Senate Document 99-3 by Floyd M. Riddick, Parliamentarian Emeritus of the Senate entitled "Majority and Minority Leaders of the Senate."

On page 26 of that document the following comment can be found.

In addition to the above organizational motions offered at the beginning of a new Congress, the responsibility for making motions essential to the day-to-day operation of the Senate has devolved upon the leadership. For example, the majority leader or someone acting for him almost invariably (a) offers motions to recess or adjourn from day to day; (b) calls up the sine die adjournment resolution and other resolutions relating to adjournment including resolutions and motions to adjourn for periods of several days; (c) makes motions to proceed to the consideration of all proposed legislation (bills and resolutions); and (d) proffers routine requests to accommodate the Senate, including orders to permit standing committees to meet while the Senate is in session, notwithstanding the provisions of the rule. While under the rules a quorum call is always in order at the suggestion of any Senator, the majority and minority leaders acting together exercise influence in determining when such calls are to be requested as well as when issues will be voted on by yea and nay vote.

It is clear to this Senator that as far as using the motion to proceed is concerned, the option is clearly a prerogative of the leadership.

So we understand the seriousness of the issue, but we also understand that when we reach a point maybe we ought to move on to something else. We are virtually on the same side in this issue, so I hope we do not get too far apart.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the schedule, as I have indicated, is to a certain extent up to the distinguished manager of the bill. There will be no votes on Monday, as I have previously announced. We will hopefully take up Superfund next week, we are trying to reach a time agreement on that.

I hope that we might complete action on this bill early this evening, but, again, that may not be possible. If that is not possible, I understand the managers would like to complete action tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. In the event action is completed on this bill today, will there be a session tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. No; if that is an incentive to Members, the answer is there would be no session tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

While I have the floor, let me say, in 30 seconds, that there is no rule, there is no precedent to the effect that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a conference report cannot be made by any Member of the Senate. To the contrary, any Member of the Senate may move to proceed to the consideration of a conference report if the papers are at the desk. It would not be anything new. It was not anything new when I did it the day before yesterday. That is perfectly in order within the rules.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, let me say that this is most interesting. In my very unbiased observation and position, I certainly think the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from West Virginia won that debate. I urge the majority leader and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee to return the lost papers.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

AMENDMENT NO. 595

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I support the amendment of Senator WILSON which would establish a program to provide legal seasonal workers in the perishable crop industry. This amendment is vital to the agricultural economy of the West and the food industry and economy of the country as a whole.

I have worked over the last 4 years to ensure that whatever immigration reform legislation Congress ultimately approved, the result would not be disastrous for this Nation's growers and ranchers. Disaster for our Nation's agricultural employers would be a disaster for everyone in this Senator's judgment. The price of food would skyrocket. The quality of our foodstuffs would plummet. The millions of people involved in our food delivery system would be laid off, have their hours cut or, worse, lose their jobs altogether.

What could cause such a disaster? Before I explain, I must make a confession for many of our Nation's agricultural employers, particularly in the West. They have become completely dependent on illegal alien workers to plant, cultivate, harvest, and prepare their crops for market. I have talked to many of these honest and law-abiding people, and have held hearings on this subject in Arizona with my distinguished colleague in the House, Congressman UDALL. These growers and ranchers have not come to this dependency on illegal workers by their own choice. They are dependent on foreign workers because they have been unable to find and employ legal workers. The work is hard. The hours are long. The working days are sporadic and geographically dispersed. And yes, for many jobs the pay is low. All of these conditions, coupled with the low status of this agricultural work, has resulted in it being very difficult, if not impossible, for western growers and ranchers to hire sufficient numbers of legal workers.

When the so-called Bracero Program was in effect many years ago, there were abuses. Certainly there was a need and justification to reform that program. But we are not talking about the Bracero Program today.

The disastrous effect that this legislation could have on our agricultural system is to make unavailable this necessary pool of illegal workers—the only workers willing, able, and available to do this vital work. If the employer sanctions work, and I continue to have my doubts, agricultural employers would be heavily penalized for continuing to hire such illegal workers. We must see to it that a mechanism is available to provide replacements for the illegal workers that we—and by "we" I mean all of us in the United States who eat—have become dependent on.

In the 97th Congress in 1982, I worked with Senators SIMPSON and KENNEDY, along with the Departments of Justice, Agriculture, and Labor, to fashion changes in the existing H-2 visa program to make it workable for western growers and ranchers. I believe we succeeded in those efforts to streamline and remodel the temporary foreign worker program so that it can be used by those with a steady, reliable, and long-term need for those workers.

In 1983, I was successful in amending the immigration bill to include a transition program for agriculture. This program acknowledged the trauma to agriculture that would result from the sudden denial of illegal alien workers to an industry which had become dependent on them. This program would allow agricultural employers to phase out their use of illegal workers over a period of 3 years.

I am grateful that Senator SIMPSON has seen fit to include both of these programs, important to me, in his 1985 immigration bill, which was reported from the Senate Judiciary Committee. And I regret that I will have to oppose Senator SIMPSON on this agricultural worker amendment. He is indeed very conscientious in his efforts to listen to all Members and attempt to accommodate them. Although we have not reached an accommodation on this one, we have on many, many other areas vital to me and my constituents, and I thank him for that. However, I believe that there is one segment of the agricultural economy whose needs have not been met by either the N visa or the transition program. That segment is the perishable crop industry.

The perishable crop industry differs from the rest of the agricultural industry in two important ways. These two differences make it impossible for employers in this segment to use the N Visa Program. First, it is impossible for growers of perishable crops to perdict more than a few days in advance when their need for workers will occur. Second, their need for workers is short and it is very intense. In this industry workers must be able to move from grower to grower as the crops ready for harvest. A program is needed to accommodate these two unique characteristics of the perishable crop industry. And of course, this program must be promulgated with proper protections for both legal resident and American workers and for the workers involved in the perishable crop program. I congratulate Senator WILSON for having crafted an amendment that strikes just such a balance between the needs of perishable crop growers and the necessary protections for all workers.

Mr. President, there are three major criticisms of the perishable crop amendment. I do not believe that any of these will stand after a careful reading of the amendment. First, it is suggested that those workers employed under this program are not protected and will be vulnerable to the type of exploitation so prevalent during the infamous Bracero Program of the 1950's.

I was a young lad in those days, but I remember visiting those bracero camps and housing developments. Indeed, there were abuses that I remember clearly to this date. Those abuses cannot happen under this amendment.

It is clear that this amendment does not create a new Bracero Program or anything like it. Workers in the program will receive temporary legal status, adverse effect wage rates, workmen's compensation, housing, and all Federal and State labor standard protections. That was not the case under the Bracero Program.

Second, opponents of the amendment argue that it will take jobs away from legal resident and American workers. The amendment, however, prohibits the use of foreign workers unless growers can establish the unavailability of domestic workers. The amendment requires the systematic recruitment of domestic workers right up until the time foreign workers are hired and permitted to come in.

The third major argument presented against the amendment is that it will result in the importation of a vast horde of foreigners who will never go home. This argument does not stand scrutiny for two reasons. First, the amendment empowers the Attorney General to control the number of workers admitted under the program and to cut off all admissions if he or she sees fit. The Attorney General determines if there is a need for foreign workers and, if so, determines how many and for what period of time. Second, the amendment creates both an incentive for workers admitted under the program to go home and a penalty for them if they do not. Twenty percent of the workers' gross wages will be withheld and returned to them in their country if they satisfy the terms of their admittance. Violations of the visa, either through not being employed during its term or failure to return home upon its expiration, will result in forfeiture of the withheld wages and disqualification from the program. I believe this carrot-and-stick approach will ensure the return of those foreign workers to their home countries.

Mr. President, adoption of this amendment is vital to the West and to the entire Nation. We have allowed a situation to develop in our agricultural industry in which we cannot get along without help from citizens of other countries. I do not believe anyone likes this situation, but we have to accept it for now and create a program to allow us to live with it while we work to change it. A sudden demise of the availability of foreign workers will result in more than the loss of a few acres of crops in California. It will have a long-term effect on the availability, price, and quality of the food we all eat. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

I thank the Chair for its courtesies. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to join the Senator from Wyoming in recommending to the Senate of the United States that we reject the amendment of the Senator from California. I think the case has been made very well by the Senator from Wyoming about the inclusion in this legislation of the open-ended provisions of the pending amendment to permit the entry of foreign workers.

But, as he knows, there is already an expedited H-2 procedure—72 hours should emergencies occur—in the bill and I think that this is a very important concession and one which addresses one of the principal concerns of the Senator from California. The bill also provides for a transition period for those particular farms that have used the undocumented aliens for a period of some 3 years to permit an orderly transition to the provisions of the legislation. And there are other provisions in the bill which address their concerns.

Now the Senator from California comes forward with an amendment, Mr. President, that is very similar to the old Bracero Program—title V of the Agricultural Act of 1945. Yet, as bad as that program was, this particular amendment fails to provide even the basic protections that were included in the Bracero program.

Mr. President, the following table briefly outlines just a few of these protections which aren't included in the Wilson amendment, and I ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE 1.—SOME PROTECTIONS IN THE 1951 "BRACERO" STATUTE THAT ARE NOT IN WILSON AMENDMENT

1. Required negotiated arrangements between governments (U.S. & Mexico), or every U.S. effort to negotiate such.

2. U.S. government role—

a. recruiting foreign workers

b. bringing them here, including transportation, subsistence, emergency medical care

c. to assist negotiation of contracts between workers and employers

d. to guarantee employer performance of contractual wage obligations

e. as a prerequisite to the employment of foreign workers, to determine that U.S. workers are not available, that reasonable efforts have been made to recruit U.S. workers for the jobs, and that employment of foreign workers will not adversely affect the wages & working conditions of similarly employed U.S. workers.

3. Prohibited providing foreign workers to an employer who also employs undocumented workers knowingly or with reasonable grounds to suspect that states or who could have ascertained that by reasonable inquiry.

4. Required members of an employer association to reimburse U.S. for its costs under the program (including losses by reason of the government guarantee of employment contracts) where the association acted as employer and defaulted on these obligations.

(In contrast Wilson would relieve association members of any responsibility for their association agent's misconduct so long as the members kept themselves ignorant of it.)

Mr. KENNEDY. More importantly, Mr. President, this amendment is unprecedent in ways that were not even contemplated during the time when we were fashioning the Bracero Program. It would permit the admission of foreign workers with a license to look for work without any determination by the Government that there are in fact specific job vacancies for them to fill and without any Government determination that there is any available Americans to do the job. It weakens standards of wages and working conditions, without any Government test of U.S. worker availability, and without any guarantee that the aliens admitted under the program will actually find any employment, or even earn enough to feed and house themselves, or pay for their transportation home.

This proposal would not only undermine the central principal of our immigration laws that U.S. citizens and permanent resident aliens should be protected from unfair competition from foreign labor, but there has been very little discussion here on the floor this afternoon about what its impact will be on American workers, on their wages and working conditions. And clearly, that is something that hopefully all of us in this body are concerned about. The fact that we have some 7.3 percent unemployment, 8 million American men and women who are unemployed today in this country, and we have a very considerable number of unemployed even in the agricultural and farm areas, yet for the first time in U.S. history we are being asked to sanction the admission of foreign nationals whose rights to reside in this country would be restricted possibly to a single geographical area.

I refer to page 12 of the Senator's amendment. "Establishment of numerical limitations by agricultural employment region." It points out here "For the purposes of the administration of the program the Attorney General"—not the Secretary of Labor or the Secretary of Agriculture—"shall designate not more than 10 agricultural employment regions within the United States. The entire United States shall be encompassed by the area of all such regions."

Then over on page 20, "a nonimmigrant visa issued under the program shall not limit the geographical area (other than by agricultural employment region) within which a seasonal agricultural worker may be employed or limit the type of seasonal agricultural employment * * *."

What this is saying is that the Attorney General will designate 10 geographical areas and the worker who comes in with that visa will be permitted to go to one area, or two or maybe even three. But he cannot go to any other area. The Attorney General is going to enforce it. Mr. President, that is as close to the pass laws of South Africa on their foreign workers and their own citizens alike. How is the Attorney General going to enforce it? How are they going to know just when they see an agricultural worker whether he is in the right district or the right region or the wrong region? They give the power of the Attorney General to enforce it. How is he going to do it? Well, on that visa or on that card there is going to have to be a designated area where he is allowed or otherwise he is going to be subject to the penalties under this amendment.

Well, if that is not like the pass laws of apartheid in South Africa, which requires all foreign workers to carry a permit and when they move through different geographical areas—geographical areas, and the country is divided into geographical areas—they have to on demand be able to show that pass. If they do not have that pass, they are subject to criminal penalties under their Department of Interior, virtually identical to what we see envisioned under this amendment's program.

Mr. President, there are many other objectionable provisions in this amendment the establishment of a very significant bureaucracy in consulates all over the hemisphere, to be able to refund the deductions of wages and the allocations by the employers of certain amounts of money for the purposes of ensuring that these individuals are going to return. We are going to establish new bureaucracies in consulates all over the hemisphere. And to establish the administration of this program, it says on page 24, it authorizes "such sums as may be necessary." It is open-ended authorization—open-ended authorization.

Mr. President, this amendment is 32 pages long—I wonder how many individuals in this body have had the opportunity to go through it with any degree of understanding about the implications of this particular program.

According to the Department of Labor—this administration's Department of Labor—the farm worker unemployment rate today is 13.5 percent, and nonfarm across this country is 7.5 percent. The unemployment rate in the agricultural area is double that in the other areas of our economy. It is half this amount according to the Department of Labor in the on season, but it is twice this amount—it gets up to 26 or 27 percent—in the off season.

But you still, even in the harvest season, according to the Department of Labor, unemployment among farm workers which is equal to the unemployment generally across the country today. Yet, here we are considering the amendment of the Senator from California that will effectively just open up every border of this country.

I understand, Mr. President, again according to the Department of Labor, 600,000 workers work in the perishable farm area.

Still we hear from the various growing associations that we need another 250,000, even though there is significant unemployment of Americans. And of all U.S. farms, only 3 percent of them use perishable workers, according to the Department of Agriculture, which amounts to 58,000 individual farms.

You talk about a special interest provision on major legislation. We are asked to consider this program that will affect 58,000 farms. That is virtually identical to the number of farms that used the braceros when the bracero program was active in the early part of the 1960's.

Mr. President, there is no question about what the impact will be if this amendment is accepted and adopted. The hourly wage for these workers is virtually half of what it is in the other areas of production across the country.

Have no question about it, Mr. President, that that amount, which is half of what the average worker gets outside of agriculture, and this does not include the white-collar worker, that amount is going to be going down for those people who are already living on the margin in our own society. The great percentage of those are Americans and American citizens.

The other day we heard the President of the United States talk in his radio program about the trade crisis, the trade deficit, what we are going to do about protecting American jobs.

Mr. President, the one way that you can assure that there will be tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of Americans who will be displaced is by accepting the Wilson amendment. Make no mistake about it. This is going to be the fastest and quickest way of throwing Americans out of their jobs that we could possibly consider on the floor of the United States Senate, Mr. President.

We hear so many individuals, many of whom are cosponsors of this amendment, cry crocodile tears for the American worker, make all these speeches with regard to the problems of the trade deficit, and here they are cosponsoring this amendment which is going to have a dramatic and significant impact on the American families who work in the agriculture areas of this country.

Mr. President, I think the amendment does not deserve to be favorably considered. As I understand, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the House has indicated that if it is favorably considered in both Houses, there would not be a conference on this bill. They will have to make their own judgment about that. But I can say that this amendment is undermining the thrust and the purpose of this legislative effort, one that has tried to tie the sanctions with legalization.

In my opening statement, I outlined my concern about how those particular provisions have been fashioned, but we will have a chance to address that portion later in the afternoon.

Mr. President, if we want to talk about basically undermining the very effective work which has been done and which hopefully will continue to be done on this legislation in trying to address this very important national problem, this particular amendment will undermine it in a very significant and I think a very unwise way.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to insert into the RECORD the analysis of the impact of Senator Wilson's amendment prepared by the AFL-CIO, the Arizona Farmworkers Union, and by the major American church and voluntary agencies.

I would particularly draw the attention of my colleagues to this important point made by the AFL-CIO:

The Wilson amendment creates a labor program that would be administered by the Attorney General, with virtually no role for the Department of Labor, the agency with the knowledge and experience in this area. While Senator Wilson has made cosmetic changes from earlier drafts of his amendment, the basic fact remains that it leaves out the essential role of the Government in protecting job opportunities for American workers and decent labor standards for foreign workers. Under the Wilson amendment the Attorney General could issue visas in a number set by him to alien workers to come to this country on their own and hunt seasonal agricultural work. These workers need not have a job offer in order to obtain a visa. They would have to arrange and pay for their transportation into and within the U.S. and the costs of finding jobs. They may move from job to job for 9 months of the year, and if they are without work and stop looking for work, they are subject to deportation. In short, the amendment would ensure a huge pool of powerless persons desperate for work under any conditions.

Mr. President, I ask that these statements be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, DC, September 12, 1985.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: The AFL-CIO has stated in testimony its strong reservations about S. 1200, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985 now on the Senate floor. There are four criteria that we believe any immigration reform legislation must meet: workable employer sanctions, protection against discrimination, generous legalization, and no weakening of the present protections in the temporary foreign worker program. Of these four, S. 1200 measures up on only one, sanctions.

As the Senate considers. S. 1200 the AFL-CIO particularly urges your critical attention to the provisions of the bill on the important and employment of temporary foreign workers in American agriculture.

There is currently a program, known as the H-2 program, operated through the Department of Labor, to evaluate and certify the need for temporary foreign workers in this country. The statutory provision establishing the current H-2 program states that employers are permitted to bring in foreign workers only temporarily and only if unemployed persons capable of performing the needed services or labor cannot be found in this country. These basic principles would be repealed by the provisions of S. 1200 with regard to agriculture. In addition, S. 1200 would establish a new temporary agricultural worker program with loopholes that would enable growers and their associations to evade even the few labor protections carried over from the present H-2 regulations.

This is not all. The Senate will be asked also to consider an amendment that would add a new bracero program to the above provisions and to the bill's transition program giving growers three years in which to shift from their present dependence on undocumented workers. This amendment, which will be offered by Senator Pete Wilson, would authorize an essentially unregulated flow of aliens to do seasonal agricultural work in the production of perishables, including picking, processing and packing.

The Wilson amendment creates a labor program that would be administered by the Attorney General, with virtually no role for the Department of Labor, the agency with the knowledge and experience in this area. While Senator Wilson has made cosmetic changes from earlier drafts of his amendment, the basic fact remains that it leaves out the essential role of the Government in protecting job opportunities for American workers and decent labor standards for foreign workers. Under the Wilson amendment the Attorney General could issue visas in a number set by him to alien workers to come to this country on their own and hunt seasonal agricultural work. These workers need not have a job offer in order to obtain a visa. They would have to arrange and pay for their transportation into and within the U.S. and the costs of finding jobs. They may move from job to job for nine months of the year, and if they are without work and stop looking for work, they are subject to deportation. In short, the amendment would ensure a huge pool of powerless persons desperate for work under any conditions.

We know that a large and powerful agricultural lobby is urging the adoption of this amendment. We respectfully suggest that such a lobby should not be permitted to ride roughshod over the working and living conditions of those whose voices from the fields are little heard in the halls of Congress. There are large pockets of unemployment among domestic seasonal farm workers in this country. The Wilson bracero amendment would drown those workers in a floodtide of foreign workers even more economically desperate and vulnerable than themselves.

The AFL-CIO urges you to vote against the Wilson amendment and support all efforts to maintain the protective conditions of the current H-2 program. We further urge—in order to make this bill a measure that we can endorse—that you support amendments prohibiting discrimination based on national origin or alien status and establishing the most generous practical legalization program.

Sincerely,

RAY DENISON, Director,
Department of Legislation.

NATIONAL OFFICE,
MIGRATION AND REFUGEE SERVICES,
Washington, DC, September 12, 1985.

DEAR SENATOR: We are writing in reference to S. 1200, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985. Our respective organizations have differing views on the utility of S. 1200; however, we are united in our opposition to the "guest worker" provisions of the bill as introduced. We are vehemently opposed to the "perishable crop" amendment that Senator Pete Wilson (R-CA) will introduce.

The Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy rejected any expansion of temporary worker programs until the effects of employer sanctions and legalization could be assessed. No evidence presented to date can justify rejection of the Select Commission's widely supported judgment.

The temporary worker proposals of S. 1200 are fundamentally flawed in several key respects:

(1) S. 1200 uses the precise language of the old "bracero" program to eliminate the requirement in current law for the recruitment of domestic workers.

(2) S. 1200 would cause substantial displacement of the domestic agricultural workforce through admission of between 300,000 to 500,000 temporary workers annually. This would be done at a time when unemployment among farmworkers is particularly acute. For example, in California and Texas, unemployment among farmworkers stands at over 20%.

(3) S. 1200 eliminates or weakens most worker protections under current law (i.e., housing, labor standards, etc.) thus inviting exploitation of workers. Past abuses of "H-2" workers suggests that more, not fewer, protections are needed.

These proposals for an expanded temporary worker program go much too far toward a policy of permanent dependence on imported labor. Ironically, the overwhelming evidence from past experience is that "temporary worker" policies stimulate and facilitate illegal migration. These proposals are inconsistent with the fundamental purpose of S. 1200.

The adoption of the Wilson amendment would intensify the contradictions inherent in the guestworker provisions of S. 1200. At a time of public concern over undocumented migration and high unemployment among domestic farmerworkers, it is unconscionable for the Senate to consider proposals which can only remind us of the "harvest of shame" this country witnessed during the days of the "bracero" program.

We trust that you will reject the Wilson proposal and any purported compromise which seeks to expand the temporary worker program beyond the limits of current law.

Thank you for your consideration of these issues.

Sincerely,

United States Catholic Conference, American Civil Liberties Union, National Council of La Raza, Church World Service/National Council of Churches, League of United Latin American Citizens, Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, HIAS, Lutheran Refugee and Immigration Service, Arizona Farmworkers Union, and National Conference of Black Lawyers.

ANALYSIS OF S. 1200 AND WILSON AMENDMENT AND RESPONSES TO GROWER ARGUMENTS

S. 1200 has three major provisions designed to expedite and increase the importation of foreign agricultural workers. In addition, Senator Pete Wilson (R. CA.) is sponsoring an amendment which would provide a temporary agricultural worker program for perishable crops. These provisions establish three new temporary worker programs which will allow between an estimated 500,000 to 800,000 foreign workers annually to enter the U.S.

A. Specifically, S. 1200 would: (1) Establish a three year agricultural labor transition program which will have the effect of legalizing the existing undocumented workforce of growers by phasing out their use over three years. A grower will be allowed to retain 100% of their undocumented workforce the first year after passage, 67% the second year and 33% the third year.

Negative impact

There is no mechanism to monitor and protect against U.S. workers being displaced,

No procedures to insure that employers not inflate the number of undocumented workers,

No mechanism to monitor and insure compliance by employer with existing labor standards and wage laws,

Complete control of worker is in the hands of employer which can and has always led to severe abuse of worker rights.

(2) Establish a special agricultural worker program (N visa) within the existing H-2 worker program which:

Negative impact

Significantly reduces the requirement that growers recruit U.S. workers by not requiring minimum recruitment period,

Significantly weakens the statutory preference for hiring U.S. workers as contained in current law,

Eliminates current law requiring H-2 growers to provide employment to any qualified worker who seeks employment during first half of contract period,

Eliminates current law's requirement that free housing be provided to each worker,

Eliminates the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL) ability to suspend certification of H-2 grower during strike of U.S. workers,

(3) Establishes a series of expedited review procedures of applications requesting foreign workers:

Negative impact

Assures that any denial of H-2 certification will be subject to multiple avenues of challenge,

Despite the amount of foreign workers being requested and the variation in crops, DOL is required to resolve appeals no later than 72 hours,

Grants authority to US Attorney General to review denials by DOL not later than 72 hours after requested, Establishes a legal presumption that grower applications will be considered acceptable unless DOL identifies deficiencies within 14 days. This is granting certification by default.

ESTIMATED ANNUAL FOREIGN WORKFORCE UNDER S. 1200

According to testimony by noted economist David North, an estimated 10% of the total undocumented population is employed in the agricultural industry. The recently published report by the National Academy of Sciences concluded that while no range can be soundly defended, "a population of 1.5 million to 3.5 million illegal aliens in 1980 appears reasonably consistent with most studies." Using the figure of 3.5 million to undocumented in the U.S., ten percent or 350,000 are employed in agriculture. Accordingly, 625,000 temporary workers would participate in the transitional program over three years.

In addition to this program, the special "N visa" program and the expedited review procedures would allow based on estimates growers have over the last few years some 300,000 temporary workers annually.

These two programs combined over a three year period would allow an estimated 500,000 temporary workers annually to enter the US and work in agriculture.

(II) Wilson Temporary Worker Program for Perishable Crops:

This temporary agricultural worker program is intended to provide a free flowing supply of un-regulated foreign temporary workers to the agricultural industry. Despite the fact that provision in S. 1200 virtually repeal all current law, growers from California insist that these provisions are burdensome and impractical for their use.

In essence, many California growers who propose the Wilson amendment are committed to maintaining a status quo of a continued over-supply of farmworkers. Instead of hiring undocumented workers they propose to legitimize their present practices and insulate themselves from any serious review.

Specifically, the Wilson amendent would:

Omit statutory preferences for hiring U.S. workers,

Omits establishing effective recruitment requirements of U.S. workers,

Establish a legal presumption that grower applications will be considered acceptable unless the U.S. Attorney General prove otherwise. In the event the A.G. is unable to process all certifications before harvest time, growers will be presumed to have complied with program terms.

Establish all substantive powers with the A.G. while giving limited responsibilities to the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL)

Provide no real penalties nor debarment of growers violating labor laws, working conditions, provisions of bill.

Elevate violation standard to "Substantively violating." This will have the practical effect of never finding any violations. In the case of violations, disqualifications from programs may not be denied more than 1 year.

Combined temporary work force resulting from S. 1200 and Wilson amendment:

We have previously estimated that some 500,000 to 600,000 workers would be allowed to be imported under the three year labor transitional program and the newly constituted expedited procedures of the H-2 Program-N visa. Proponents of the Wilson Amendment represented to various Senators that they would be willing to accept a cap of 350,000 temporary agricultural workers annually for perishable crops annually. The combined total of all three temporary agricultural worker programs would be approximately 800,000 foreign workers a year for three years and approximately 500,000 to 600,000 there after.

These estimates would more than double the existing estimates of 10 percent of the total undocumented workers in the U.S. of 3.5 million which are said to work in the agricultural industry. This is being proposed at a time when unemployment amongst U.S. Farmworkers has been over 20% for the last three years.

FACTS ABOUT GROWER MYTHS

The following information is based on a study California's Farmworkers conducted by the University of California (UC) and the California State Employment Development Department (EDD). It provides important facts on the farmworker population of California. Most importantly, these facts are from the state whose growers have been the major proponents of cheap temporary worker programs.

Myth—Growers fear that a legalization/Amnesty program would phase out their undocumented workforce who would choose to leave farmwork for urban jobs.

Fact—"According to the VC-EDD survey, more farm workers have contacts to rural employment than to city jobs in the U.S. Moreover, there appears to be little difference according to legal status. Most of the undocumented, like immigrant farmworkers as a whole, do not have urban job contacts. Survey results demonstrate clearly that workers are restrained from moving to city jobs for reasons other than their legal status. Among the undocumented only 12 percent reported that lack of legal papers was their motivation for staying in rural areas. Most cannot move to cities because they have no contacts to jobs or housing. Instead, they prefer to stay in an area where their skills are salable.

Myth—Growers contend that a dominant portion of agricultural labor force is undocumented and therefore temporary worker programs are needed.

Fact—The UC-EDD survey found that a central characteristic of California farm labor markets is the availability of a large pool of workers who individually experience long spells of unemployment. The survey found an average period of unemployment of over 20 weeks for farmworker heads of household. Corroboration of the existence of this pool is shown by comparing the demand for farmworkers with the numbers of individuals actually doing the work. For example, in the late 1970's total demand for in-field labor was approximately 128,000 workers working year-round. But in 1978 there were 298,000 farmworkers who earned more than $800 in 1978 implying the existence of a labor pool with over twice as many workers as there were available jobs.

Overall employers in California face a very stable supply of workers. Scarcities are rare for almost all crop activities.

Myth—A legalization/Amnesty program will not provide a sufficient work-force for the agricultural industry and therefore temporary worker programs are necessary.

Fact—The UC-EDD report concluded that "A generous amnesty would actually alleviate the short-run, if faced with a permanently curtailed labor supply, employers might be obliged to improve working conditions, offer year around employment, and implement technologies which lighten farm tasks. These changes could lengthen farm work careers, attract more women and domestic workers to farm work, and lessen the need for an uncontrolled influx of Mexican workers." The approximately 70 percent had resided in the U.S. for up to 10 years and would thus qualify for either House-Senate legalization program.

Wilson amendment and its false representations:

Myth—Proponents of the Wilson Amendment have emphasized that this program will not result in increasing the flows of undocumented workers and that the workers will have adequate rights and privileges. They believe that by requiring the undocumented to have 20% of their salaries kept in a fund not refundable unless they return after contract period will prove a sufficient safeguard.

Fact—The staff Report of the U.S. Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, the Commission which Senator Simpson and others have taken their guidance from in drafting S. 1200, indicated that all previous temporary agricultural worker programs authorized employers to hire temporary workers and to insure that INS was notified. However, because of lack of adequate enforcement many workers deserted their contracts and found higher paying jobs elsewhere. It was found that "a total 72,862 temporary workers had been admitted from 1917 to 1921, of which 21,400" deserted their employment and disappeared."

The report highlights the observations of the famous Bracero program by historian Otey Scruggs who said. "The basic weakness of the program was lack of adequate enforcement machinery. Too much reliance was placed on the good faith of the parties involved. In the case of the farmers, most of whom were haunted by the fear of labor shortage, and who had come to regard the use of Mexican labor as a natural right, an appeal to good faith plainly was chimerical." Once again we find the Wilson Amendment depending on the "good faith" of growers to insure recruitment of domestic workers and compliance with labor law and working condition standards.

Furthermore, the report found that after the first temporary worker program a dramatic increase in Mexican immigration, legal and illegal occurred, increasing from 221,915 in 1910 to 484,418 in 1920 and 890,746 in 1926.

In 1942 when the infamous Bracero program commenced it carried with it many of the same provisions and more than the Wilson Amendment is proposing. The report found that "Despite these strict guarantees, however, workers rights and privileges under the Bracero program were not generally upheld and abuses were common. Such rights were not commonly granted to domestic farmworkers and there were no enforcement mechanisms. Further illegal entry continued unabated as U.S. employers continued to hire undocumented/illegal workers to protest the terms of the Bracero Program. During the 22 year history of the program 4.5 million workers came in as Braceros, but 5 million were apprehended as illegals.

Today, while some things have changed such as farmworkers having more rights than before, sadly but true, there is no serious enforcement of these rights. While Wilson is being proposed along with sanctions it must be noted that less than 5% of all growers in California and in the U.S. are reviewed by INS agents for hiring undocumented. The hiring of the undocumented by the agricultural industry will undoubtedly continue. The Wilson Amendment makes absolutely no serious effort to insure workers' rights and insure equity. It is a grower's program as all others have been in the past.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I would like to join my colleague, Senator WILSON, in urging the Senate's acceptance of this amendment, which would establish a seasonal Agricultural Worker Program for the perishable commodity industry.

Mr. President, I have long advocated a comprehensive reform of our Nation's immigration laws. I applaud and support my colleague, Senator SIMPSON'S efforts to reform these laws. In order to establish a truly comprehensive and successful immigration policy, however, we must address the unique and legitimate needs of a substantial portion of this country's farmers. Thousands of growers involved in the production of perishable commodities would be seriously harmed by S. 1200. The H-2 Program contained in this bill is simply not flexible enough to meet the unique needs of perishable crops, which are labor-intensive and highly sensitive to changing weather conditions. This amendment would establish a Complementary Seasonal Worker Program which would be a safety valve available only to those in the perishable commodity industry.

The domestic production of perishable crops represents nearly $23 billion in value to farmers, workers, and consumers. Growers involved in the production of perishable commodities provide employment to approximately 650,000 people Nation wide. In the State of Washington, fruit farming is a half billion dollar industry which employs over 30,000 workers during the harvest season. Washington State is the Nation's leading supplier of cherries and apples, and is the Nation's second largest supplier of pears, prunes, plums, grapes, and apricots; 20 percent of Washington State's entire apple crop is exported to foreign countries, adding to our national trade effort and creating a substantial number of additional jobs.

Growers of these perishable crops in the State of Washington and throughout the Nation have traditionally relied heavily on foreign labor. We must face the reality that a large percentage of these workers are in the United States illegally and there is no guarantee that enough domestic workers will step forward to fill these jobs once illegal immigration is under control.

Unlike the larger wheat farms which use mechanical harvesters, the perishable crop industry, which is largely comprised of small family farms, is labor intensive and a large number of workers is required to harvest the crops. Fruit and vegetable harvesting is physically demanding, unpleasant work, and even at reasonably high wages, the industry has not attracted sufficient numbers of domestic workers. If the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985 is to establish a realistic and workable immigration policy, it must not force farmers to choose between hiring illegal workers and losing their crops. The choice should be between hiring domestic workers if available and, if not, hiring legal foreign workers in a program that meets the needs of the perishable grower and provides protections for both foreign and domestic workers.

The H-2 Worker Program included in S. 1200 is simply not usable for the thousands of farmers involved in many kinds of perishable agricultural production. The H-2 Program would still tie the worker to a particular grower, thus preventing the movement from grower to grower that is essential when perishable producers face changing climatic conditions. The H-2 Program also continues the requirement that the grower predict, weeks in advance, when and how many workers will be needed. This is unrealistic considering the harvest volatility of perishable crops.

In addition, the H-2 program's 72-hour emergency provisions intended to address the problems created by an earlier than expected need for workers, a shortage of workers, or a failure to apply for labor certification would nonetheless fail to solve those problems for several reasons. First, the emergency provisions would only be triggered when a critical need exists and the grower would have to wait in line with thousands of other growers for a decision within 72 hours by the Department of Labor as to whether a critical need exists. This decision would have to be made in 72 hours when the growers may need workers within 24 or 48 hours to save the crops.

Moreover, even if a grower did receive an approval for more workers within 72 hours, a contractural relationship would have to be established between the workers and the grower, proper visas and documentation for the workers would have to be obtained, and foreign workers would have to be recruited and brought into the United States. It is completely unrealistic to think that all of this could be done in less than a week, and growers would likely need a large number of additional workers in less than 72 hours.

In June of this year, for example, farmers in Washington State's Yakima Valley were faced with an impending rainstorm during the cherry harvest. As some of you may not know, a rainstorm at the time of a cherry harvest can split the fruit, thus devastating entire orchards. Cherry growers in the Yakima Valley had to triple their work force in a matter of hours. They were able to do so, and the crop was saved. This undoubtedly would not have been the outcome if the growers had attempted to use the H-2 Program in S. 1200. Only a seasonal agricultural worker program that allow workers to move freely from grower to grower during the harvest period can ensure the availability of an adequate work force in a timely manner if a critical need exists.

This amendment avoids the problems of the H-2 Program by admitting workers into specific growing regions thoughout the United States on a monthly basis and enabling them to move freely from grower to grower without the restriction of a contract. The lack of a contract not only would enable them to move in response to crop emergencies but also in response to higher wages dictated by the emergency demand for workers. The workers would benefit from higher wages allowed by a free market system and the growers would benefit by being able to harvest a crop that otherwise would rot.

This approach would assure that there are pools of workers in growing regions at critical periods with the freedom to respond to changes in labor needs dictated by variable weather. Under this amendment and unlike the H-2 Program, if a rainstorm were to create an earlier-than-expected need for workers, they would already be in the region and would be free to respond to the employment needs of growers producing commodities affected by the weather.

This amendment would establish a new seasonal agricultural worker program which would meet the unique needs of the perishable commodity industry, while protecting foreign and domestic labor and ensuring that the foreign workers will return to their own countries. Specifically, this amendment would establish a new category of nonimmigrant seasonal worker who could be employed solely by qualified growers of perishable commodities for a limited period. The key feature of the program would be the ability of workers to move freely among employers following the ripening and harvesting cycles of perishable crops within a specified region.

The Attorney General would admit foreign workers in 10 agricultural regions created throughout the United States for employment in the perishable crop industry only when he determines, after consultation with the Secretaries of Labor and Agriculture, that there is an insufficient number of domestic workers to meet the needs of the producers. In making a determination as to whether any workers should be admitted, the Attorney General would be required to take into consideration the availability of domestic agricultural labor and the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor to find domestic workers willing to work in this industry. The Department of Labor would appropriate $10 million annually to assist in this effort.

A seasonal worker's ability to participate in the program would be based largely upon his or her experience in the production of perishable commodities. Workers would be given visas that would, in most instances, admit them to work for a period not to exceed 9 months. Strong incentives are provided to encourage workers to return to their countries of origin by withholding 20 percent of their wages, which would be returned to them through the U.S. consulate in their country of origin upon their return and proof of compliance with terms of the visa, including the requirement of continuous employment in perishable agriculture. If workers are not continuously employed, they must leave the United States. Failure to do so within 30 days of their last verifiable employment could result in forfeiture of their withheld wages.

Unlike the old Bracero Program, this new program contains features not only to protect foreign workers but to assure that their admission does not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of domestic workers. Foreign workers would be entitled to workmen's compensation and housing, and they would receive the adverse effect wage that could not fall below the minimum wage. The program includes various monitoring provisions, as well as civil and other penalties for violation of its terms by employers.

Growers who participate in the program would be required to make a good-faith effort to recruit domestic workers until the day foreign workers begin working. Growers participating in the program in the prior 12 months would be required to provide a summary of their past recruitment efforts. Participating growers would pay a users fee that would be more than adequate to cover administration costs, and they would be required to assist the Attorney General in tracking and monitoring the movements of workers admitted under the program by notifying the Attorney General within 72 hours of hiring or terminating the employment of any seasonal worker under the program.

Frankly, the same number of workers will be needed no matter what we do. If domestic workers are not available and the new seasonal agricultural worker program is not enacted, H-2 workers will be brought in. If, as I believe, H-2 is not workable in the perishable commodity industry because of its time and mobility constraints, the danger is that, in order to stay in business, farmers will resort to the present practice of hiring illegal workers—precisely the problem we are trying to avoid.

Mr. President, what we wish to do is change a present system which has the United States filled with illegal workers. We can only do that and preserve an important part of our economy if we recognize their special needs and take men and women who are now working illegally and give them an opportunity to work legally.

This amendment is in the best interests of consumers, domestic workers, and the foreign workers themselves. In my view, this amendment is consistent with the goals of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985. It will help ensure that the thousands of farmers who are involved in the multibillion dollar perishable commodity industry are not forced out of business. I urge my colleagues to give this amendment their full support.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I want to join the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SIMPSON] in opposition to this amendment. Many of the points have been made by him and by Senator KENNEDY. Let me just point out two other flaws that I believe exist in this amendment.

No. 1, which department of the Federal Government has the knowledge of labor supply, when we have needs and when we do not have needs? It is fairly obvious that department is the Department of Labor. Which department is going to make the determination here? Not the Department of Labor; the Department of Justice. It seems to me that is a pretty basic flaw. But there is another item.

If you look to pages 7 and 8 of the Wilson amendment—and I have great respect for the Senator from California and his intent—there is a provision that I do not know of any parallel to. Maybe there are parallels somewhere in the Federal statutes, but I know of none in the Federal statutes nor in the statutes of Illinois. It says either the individual employer or an association of employers may apply for the permit to bring in workers. Then it says, if you turn to page 8, "member's violation does not necessarily disqualify association or other members." and the other way around: The "association's violation does not necessarily disqualify members."

So what we have is an open invitation. Everybody gets a double shot at breaking the law, opening this door wider than it is already widened here.

Clearly, Mr. President, we should not be moving in that direction. I hope the Wilson amendment is rejected.

Let me add just one other thing: The Senator from Wyoming said to me the other day, asked me if there were any chance I was going to be voting for this. I responded there was a possibility—not a probability, but a possibility. But if the Wilson amendment is adopted, there is no way many of us could vote for this legislation. This just opens the door wide to every possible abuse. I do not think it is the direction we ought to go in. I hope we have the good sense to resist the pressure from these growers.

I understand the economic realities—at least, I understand them a little bit. But we do not want to be moving in this direction. I hope we will reject the amendment.

Mr. SYMMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. D'AMATO). The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, first, I thank the Senator from California for offering the amendment, and I am pleased to share in the cosponsorship with him of this effort. Also, I compliment the distinguished Senator from Washington for what I think is a very accurate presentation of what the picture is with respect to the necessity for this amendment in the fresh fruit and vegetable industry in the Pacific Northwest specifically.

The Senator from Washington made very clear the workability of the H-2 Program. I think it is interesting, to add to what he said, that the sweet cherry crop in Washington, Oregon, and Idaho was harvested prior to the 4th of July this year. That is the first time in some 25 or 30 years. It was an extraordinarily early year. If you had peach, pear, and prune pickers lined up to work in 3 or 4 weeks after the cherries had come off, which is normal, about 3 weeks after that, these small farmers would have had workers lined up under the H-2 Program to finish the harvest and they would have found out, because of the extraordinarily cold weather after the 4th of July, that everything got delayed by 2 weeks.

I hope that Senators will heed very carefully the thoughtful remarks of the senior Senator from Washington, because I think they were right on target. He said very accurately that this amendment is absolutely essential if this bill becomes law and is to be a workable law and achieve the noble goals that some of our colleagues wish to achieve in their quest for immigration reform. It is a humanitarian amendment.

I have heard some comments by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and others which imply that this amendment will not be good for the workers. It is totally the opposite. Without this amendment we are ignoring what is going on in the real world where perishable crops are being harvested.

I think we should not do that. There is a legal guest worker program in effect today. It is good for the workers. It is good for the consumers. It is good for those nationals from Mexico who have a much lower standard of living. They take their money. They go home. They spend it directly on their families. There is no interference. It is probably the most efficient foreign aid program the United States has in effect today.

The amendment of the Senator from California provides assurances that these people will be properly treated, so that they will be paid in a proper fashion, housed in a proper fashion, transported in a proper fashion, and have normal protections as fellow human beings. I might add that in most cases these people are nationals of our neighboring nation of Mexico. They are fellow Americans in that respect. They are fellow North Americans. I believe, from a humanitarian aspect, what the Senator is trying to do is absolutely right.

I wish to begin my remarks also by thanking my distinguished colleague and friend, Senator SIMPSON, for his efforts to address this problem. I know the Senator from Wyoming very sincerely listened to the concerns of the fruit and vegetable growers and he has taken some steps toward trying to meet them. I recognize and appreciate the chairman's efforts to modify the H-2 Program, but I think we have to say, as Senator GORTON did earlier, that the modifications incorporated in S. 1200 fall far short of the mark in our efforts to meet the needs of the perishable crop growers.

Under the provisions of S. 1200, the present certification period—and I hope my colleagues who are not familiar with the produce industry will listen carefully to this—that is, the time that must expire between the grower's application for foreign laborers and the day on which those laborers begin working, is reduced from 80 days to 65 days. Also, a 72-hour emergency application procedure is proposed. Seventy-two hours, I say to my colleagues, is 3 days. In terms of the Washington State cherry harvest which took place this year, during 3 days they harvested about 40 percent of their crop by doubling the numbers of workers.

Now, those committee modifications will enhance the ability of the farmers who participate in the H-2 Program to anticipate the harvest date and the labor needs when they apply for foreign laborers. However, they will have to guess 65 days in advance of when their crop will be ready. And as I already mentioned, this year in the Pacific Northwest started out as a very early year, the earliest year that I can remember for the harvest of strawberries, sweet cherries, and apricots. Then, all of a sudden, a cold snap came and everything was delayed. Now it is a little later than average. I think those are the real problems which make the H-2 Program unworkable.

The perishable crop producers are absolutely not able to forecast the weather and crop conditions with the kind of accuracy to work through the bureaucracy and actually have workers there when needed. Recognizing the special needs of these farmers who must harvest their fruits and vegetables in a matter of days or face disastrous losses, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has added a 72-hour emergency provision to this bill. I know he is trying hard to meet the needs of the produce growers with this provision, but it just simply is not enough. Under this bill the emergency provision would be triggered when a "critical need" exists. That is what it says, critical need. A grower who has a critical need would have to wait 72 hours for the Department of Labor to make the same decision. Then additional visas must be issued and foreign workers must be located and recruited under the Department of Labor contractual agreement.

Now, the Senator from Washington mentioned the sweet cherry crop splitting when it rains. You simply cannot wait 3 days to harvest a cherry crop if there is an impending rainstorm because it would totally decimate the value and the usability of that crop. If they wait for the Department to get the paperwork together and the crop is destroyed then where would that leave the workers?

What I am saying, Mr. President, is that the time spent by producers of perishable crops applying for emergency help is time they simply cannot afford if the crop is to be saved. If a heat wave hits southern Idaho, produce growers must expand their work force up to 5 or 10 times the normal level and the workers will have to be available in a day or two, otherwise the crop will be ruined by the extreme heat. All of these difficulties are in addition to the problems that the Department of Labor will face when hundreds or even thousands of farmers are clammering for emergency visas because the weather has suddenly changed.

The Department of Labor has a very difficult time processing the applications under the current H-2 Program under which less than 20,000 foreign workers are allowed to enter annually. It is working fairly well in some areas, in sheepherding and others, where it can be predicted somewhat in advance that the sheep will be moved, and so forth, and also it is a much lower labor intense type of work so there are not as many workers involved. But as I said, the Department of Labor is currently having a difficult time processing those applications under the current H-2 Program with less than 20,000 foreign workers being annually employed under that program. So one can imagine what the problems would be if we tried to expand that program many times over to take care of perishable commodities. Also the H-2 proposal in this bill does not allow a grower to postpone the arrival time of workers if cold weather delays a harvest period. As a result, the workers would arrive early and they must be paid, housed, and fed even though they are not working. With the farm economy what it is today, we simply cannot afford that. I doubt that there are farmers in the Nation who can afford an inefficient contractual agreement of this sort. Most of these growers are very small family farm operators in my State and in the Pacific Northwest in general and they would be unable to operate under those terms.

Mr. President, for those reasons I think Congress must adopt the Wilson amendment, which will be an alternative that will supplement the H-2 Program and ensure a stable supply of workers for the Nation's perishable crop industry.

Under our amendment, temporary workers will be subject to approval and control by the Attorney General with strong incentives for them to return to their country of origin. The amendment has been very carefully drafted and includes the following provisions: The Attorney General will be able to determine the number of workers to be admitted based on the demonstrated need and availability of domestic workers. I think it is very important for the program to have the flexibility to see how many workers are really going to be needed. No. 2, the guest workers would be given visas to work only in perishable commodities for a period of no longer than 9 months. The distinguished Senator from California has even limited the scope of that. The growers would be required to notify the Attorney General within 72 hours after hiring an individual and again within 72 hours after the individual leaves the employer's service.

Growers would be required to withhold 20 percent of the employee's wages to be escrowed in an account at the U.S. consulate in the employee's home country. Workers will collect this money upon their return and after showing proof of compliance with the terms of the visa. The 20 percent would be forfeited if they did not return or could not show they had been continuously employed.

Also, Mr. President, farmers participating in this program would have to:

Make a good faith effort to recruit domestic workers;

Provide wages and working conditions comparable to those given domestic workers;

Provide housing or a housing allowance to foreign workers and Provide workmen's compensation or its equivalent to guest workers.

This program will make possible the mobility of workers that is essential to the perishable crop industry. It does not require the contractual arrangements that are part of the H-2 Program and which make that program unworkable for growers who depend on a labor force that can move quickly from one farm to another. Yet, this guest worker program provides the control necessary to monitor the movements of foreign workers while they remain in this country.

Mr. President, our labor and immigration policies should be designed to ensure that a dependable labor force will be available to harvest the Nation's agricultural products. This amendment will help us achieve that goal, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. President, our labor and immigration policy should be designed to ensure that people will be available to harvest the Nation's agricultural products, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

I say again that out there in the real world, where the produce is being harvested, there is an illegal guest worker program in place right now. It is happening whether we like to think about it in the Senate or not. That is what is going on. We should keep that in mind when we pass legislation that calls for immigration reform, in view of what is happening in Central America, where we have more and more people voting with their feet to escape places like Nicaragua and the turmoil that is on the burner of Castro and Daniel Ortega and others, and what their plans are for Mexico. I think the question of immigration reform is bigger than just passing this legislation.

Specifically, without this amendment, this legislation simply will not do what the authors intend it to do. It will not give us reform. The same situation that exists today will exist next year and the year after and the year after that, unless the American people simply do not want fresh fruits and vegetables. If they want all canned produce that is grown offshore and shipped into the country, that is what will happen. I do not think that is what the American people want.

I can say from personal experience, from seeing this, that the guest workers in this country today, in the Pacific Northwest, are making the same wages as the domestic workers who are working there. In most cases, it is twice and often much more than twice the minimum wage.

So the question is not wages. The question is practicability, the viability of having the workers there, and the flexibility to hire people who want the jobs.

All these people in the guest worker program want, is an opportunity to earn an honest living, doing a job that American citizens choose not to do.

I have had countless growers in my State tell me that they have a standing order at the employment office for workers to harvest perishable crops, and they hardly get anyone hired. They have a standing order for several workers. I have had hundreds of farmers tell me that, and I know it to be the truth. They never can hire domestic workers.

This is absolutely important. This is a very important amendment to those of us in the West. I say to my colleagues that this amendment is going to be the best possible solution to a very difficult problem. Without it, the same abuses that many of my colleagues talk about will occur. They are only in a very small area. On occasion, somebody is exploited.

If we leave this amendment out of this legislation, the things people talk about, the exploitation of Mexican nationals and other things, will still take place. The Senator from Washington said it better than I, and he stated what is going on all across Arizona, California and other areas—a situation that still exists. Some of us have been in the fields and have seen the produce operation in action.

I hope my colleagues will take heed, and I urge the support of this amendment.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I am happy to associate myself with the Senator from California and others who have spoken on behalf of this measure.

There is no sense in my repeating the same points that have been made over and over as to what the Wilson amendment is and is not. But there is one point I should like to address, and I will do it quickly.

Those who oppose this amendment want to debate the issue of foreign nationals working in this country. It is clear, however, that the bill itself recognizes that under some set of circumstances, it is going to be necessary in agriculture to allow foreign nationals into the country, under a certain set of conditions, to engage in the production of agricultural products. That is what the H-2 section is about.

So the debate here is not about the world we hope will exist, a world in which there are Americans eager to take every job, in which we produce goods and services at the price we can afford to pay, given the vagaries of nature, without any kind of guest worker program. The proponents of this bill have already conceded that that is not the case.

The question here is whether or not the H-2 Program can work, whether or not we need an additional provision in the bill—in this case, the provision provided by the Senator from California.

In my State, we produce about $200 million worth of products that, No. 1, are perishable and that, No. 2, are highly dependent on labor for its production—everything ranging from onions to jalapeno peppers.

Mr. President, we do not have an onion set-aside program. We pay no one not to produce jalapeno peppers. If we need labor to come in and harvest a crop and the labor is not there, the farmer who has invested his or her life's worth is going to lose it.

The H-2 Program is not used to any significant extent in my State because it is unworkable. It is simply not flexible enough to meet our needs. Maybe it would be great if we did not have needs, but we are not debating that. Even the authors of the bill recognize and concede that point.

I am a cosponsor of the Wilson amendment because I think it gives greater flexibility, because I think it will come closer to meeting the needs of my State, and because we are entering an uncharted area in agricultural production.

We do not know what the passage of the Simpson bill will do in terms of economics. I think it is vitally important in this era of uncertainty that we have a safety valve that will protect perishable products, which are labor intensive, under what I believe to be a very stringent set of circumstances aimed at protecting domestic labor, aimed at granting status to those who come into the country to work on our farms and our fields, to protect them in terms of housing, health care, wages, and working conditions.

I think that this safety valve is vitally important.

I hope the Wilson amendment will be adopted. I intend to vote for it. I urge my colleagues to do so.

I believe that if this bill is adopted without the Wilson amendment, it will impose great hardship on American agriculture, especially perishable products, and that we will be back here next year or the next year voting on a provision very similar to the Wilson amendment, only the fellow who planted the onions this year or the peppers or the cauliflower may not be in business. So my view is in entering this unchartered area with new labor laws, in trying to eliminate the massive employment of illegal aliens to stop the flow of illegal aliens into the country, I believe we need this safety valve and I am for it and I am going to vote for it, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Wilson amendment to the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985. I really do admire the work that Senator SIMPSON has done on this difficult and complex issue. Not just this year but in the past.

It certainly is an area that has needed national attention, and I commend the Senator for his persistence and hard work in developing a solution. However, because of the specific needs of growers of perishable agricultural commodities an alternative must be allowed and therefore I am in support of Senator WILSON's amendment to S. 1200.

Although the H-2 program and proposed improvements to it in S. 1200 may work well for certain types of agriculture, it is not well suited to meet the needs of thousands of farmers involved in many kinds of perishable agricultural production. The improvements included in the S. 1200 may substantially benefit those who can use an H-2 program. They fail to address, however, the basic objections of those who feel that an H-2 program can not meet the needs of perishable agriculture even with a 72 hour emergency application procedure, a provision allowing the workers to "briefly" roam after the expiration of their initial contract, and reduction of the precertification period from 80 days to 65 days. These provisions are inadequate for a number of reasons.

First, because of the vagaries of weather, perishable growers cannot predict with certainty when they will need to harvest and how many workers will be needed. The H-2 Program is too inflexible to assure that enough workers can be provided on a timely basis in an emergency due to a change in weather.

Second, under the H-2 Program S. 1200 is insufficient to handle the needs of perishable commodities. Perishable crops are extremely sensitive to weather conditions. It is impossible to pin down the exact time a perishable crop will be ready for harvesting.

For example, in Idaho alone such perishable commodities as apples, peaches, prunes, plums, and sweet cherries accounted for $31,366,000 in trade in 1983. This figure excludes potatoes and onions which together accounted for an additional $347,000,000. It is impossible for the growers of these products to predict 65 to 80 days in advance when their crops will be ready for harvest. Harvest time is determined by the amount of moisture received and the heat of the summer. These crops must be picked and packed within a short period of time otherwise they will be lost at considerable cost to the producers. These growers must have help, almost always on short notice, or they will lose their crops.

On a national scale, the perishable crop industry is also very substantial. Current production is valued at nearly $23 billion. This industry is also obviously important to the consumers in America who have become accustomed to high quality fresh fruits and vegetables on a year-round basis at a reasonable price.

If S. 1200 is effective in reducing the number of undocumented workers in this country, those involved in the perishable crop industry face a choice: they can hire domestic workers if they are available and qualified; however, if they are not, they have to decide between hiring illegal undocumented workers or losing their crop. They would choose the first option at the risk of facing civil or criminal penalties for violating the law. A well constructed immigration reform package should not force a choice between hiring illegals or losing a crop.

I believe the real choice should be between hiring domestic workers if available and, if not, hiring legalized foreign workers in a program that provides safeguards by providing protections that are not available to undocumented workers today.

My colleague's amendment would ensure that a sufficient supply of seasonal workers could be provided in a timely manner in the event of domestic worker shortages. It will protect the rights of both domestic and foreign workers, provide decent wages and working conditions and guarantee that workers return to their countries of origin upon the expiration of their temporary visa. I might also add that the administrative costs of the program will be borne by participating growers through a user fee required by the amendment and not by the American taxpayer.

In simple terms, the amendment simply assures that any immigration reform proposal containing employer sanctions will not confront thousands of small family farms in this country with the option of either going out of business due to a lack of an available workforce or facing heavy civil and criminal penalties for failing to comply with the immigration laws. Moreover, the Wilson amendment will also provide protections to the workers and ensure regular supplies of perishable commodities to American consumers.

I urge the support of my colleagues on this amendment.

Mr. President, allow me to rephrase and restate just one very simple fact of life: A farmer who has brought his crop to the point of harvest does not face just the loss of income that might be a temporary loss for a short period of time, if he cannot harvest that crop when it is ready, he loses the whole year's income.

There has been much rhetoric in this Chamber over the last several months about the plight of the American farmer and his need for additional credit to tide him over periods of time such as the one we are experiencing in the country today. What is being suggested in this legislation is that we expose that self-same farmer to the dilemma of losing his farm for the lack of income created by the shortage of workers or take the risk of civil and criminal penalties. Do you really want a farmer to face that choice? Do you really want to put him in the box of deciding whether or not to violate the law or lose his farm?

I think there has to be a better answer. I think the distinguished Senator from California and the amendment that he has offered has found that answer. I do urge its support.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it has been a thoughtful debate. I think we are nearly ready to conclude. I think Senator WILSON would indicate, too, that we are about ready to proceed here.

Regretfully, and yet with clarity, at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks or anyone else who wishes to speak, I will move to table the amendment when it is perfectly apparent that everyone has finished their debate. Certainly not until then. But I will do that.

Let me just say two things with regard to what we have done here in S. 1200. I remember the debate and it is good to hear Senator McCLURE, Senator SYMMS, and Senator WILSON. All of us have been in this debate and in the former two versions of this bill.

Mr. SYMMS. In fact, it has been much less vigorous today than it was the last time we were engaged in that, I say to my dear friend.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I can tell you that it has been much less vigorous. In fact, we were using pictures, as I was describing the scene, taken two blocks from the Capitol where they apprehended several illegal, undocumented workers.

Senator SYMMS, from Idaho, was in spirited discussion on that with me. I remember it very well.

But I think the issue is that we did a lot. I think that even those who speak today will know that we did an awful lot between what we had in the first bill and the second bill and what's in S. 1200. S. 1200 is a distillation of the conference committee activity and a refinement of the so-called Panetta-Morrison amendment with oak leaf clusters, if you would refer to an old military phrase.

So, it thinned out. It took some of the sting out of it. Yet it surprised the House when the Panetta-Morrison amendment passed by 58 votes—a startling vote to the proponents and the opponents of immigration reform.

But I just would review once again for you, just so the record is clear and those who are listening know, that we have provided in S. 1200 many expedited procedures for growers—not just western growers but any perishable growers in the United States. When labor certification is denied—and that happens so often and is so frustrating for all of us in the West—when labor certification is denied for workers needed in "perishable commodities," it will trigger the expedited process.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. SYMMS. Does not the administration support this amendment?

Mr. SIMPSON. The Wilson amendment?

Mr. SYMMS. Yes.

Mr. SIMPSON. The administration, I must say we have conflicting signals. We have the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Agriculture—I eventually always have to go see the President of the United States and say to him, "Are you still on board?" And he says, "Yes." But I have had the eternal struggle with this administration from the beginning and have never ever gone through immigration reform on the basis that the administration was for this or for that. In many cases, simply if I had not had William French Smith and Attorney General Meese and GEORGE BUSH and the President, I would never know where I had been with the administration on immigration reform. It is beyond my ken. I am unable to track that.

Mr. SYMMS. They do support the amendment, though?

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, I do not support it.

Mr. SYMMS. You do not, but the administration does.

Mr. SIMPSON. Some parts of the administration do, some do not. It is that kind of a curious situation.

Mr. McCLURE. If the Senator will yield, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has before him a statement of administration policy, which does very explicitly support the Wilson amendment. If he does not want to refer to that in this debate, I hope he will not refer to the last paragraph when we get around to another amendment in which the administration supports his position.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, so that we do clear the air—and we eventually get that done in this place—I have before me a September 12, 1985, memorandum on the Immigration Reform and Control Act.

The administration supports the enactment of S. 1200 with the adoption of the amendments to establish a self-financed, limited seasonal worker program which will provide field harvest labor for perishable commodities.

That is in the bill. That is S. 1200. That is what it is. It had administration support, the very much scaled down seasonal worker program. Then it goes on to describe that the MSPA, that is the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act, would have to apply. And it does not. Right now, in the proposal presented by Senator WILSON, this does not apply. The MSPA regs have to apply, according to this administration memorandum. And this amendment does not comply with that. So I guess I can tell you that part of it.

We—in S. 1200—are also saying when U.S. workers show up for work but are not able, willing, and qualified, the expedited procedures go into place.

Also, when U.S. workers fail to show up as promised, the expedited procedures go into place. And when a grower faces a critical need for workers due to unforeseen circumstances—and I express to you that would be an unexpected change in the weather occurring within 3 days of need—that would trigger an expedited procedure.

Under those circumstances, the Government agency involved—and that would be either the Department of Labor or the Attorney General, depending upon the situation—must then respond within 72 hours. That is what S. 1200 provides.

So, I did want to share that with you. And then just say, and I think I can conclude—and I direct the remarks to those thoughtful persons on the other side of the debate—we have found in our travels of 6 years that many of the growers from the West do not understand or they misunderstand intentionally the H-2 Program. They do not want to take the time to use it or they have had some friend that tried it and it did not work and they got hammered or they got tired of dealing with the Labor Department. And that is true. I know that happened.

However, we speak of the experiences in the West, where the H-2 Program, as I say, has never been tried. But even in Idaho—and I cite to my two colleagues, and they know it much better than I—there is a movement now in Idaho to form an association of growers to apply for the current H-2 Program. Apparently over 100 growers have expressed an interest in Idaho with over I believe 1,200 job opportunities involved.

Now, that effort right now I believe is limited to irrigation. But with S. 1200 and its improved H-2 Program I think we can certainly move on to harvesting and other critical labor.

I hear Senator SYMMS' remarks clearly when he asks how can the Labor Department, which has difficulty in processing 20,000 applications—and that is all we use in H-2 now—how will they be able to handle the hundreds of thousands of new applications? I hope the phrase "hundreds of thousands" does not reverberate through here because that is what terrorizes organized labor; that is what frightens people who talk about an expanded guest worker program. If there were some cap we might reach, that could be dispelled. I do not think any of us want a million guest workers or 2 million.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the Senator yield for a comment and a question on that?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. SYMMS. The point I am trying to get at is that the undocumented workers in the country number, depending on whose figures you listen to, anywhere from 5 million to 15 million. A very small percentage of them—the Senator has said himself, and I believe we all agree—actually work in American agriculture. The threat to organized labor and industrial jobs and manufacturing jobs, the fear you always hear from organized labor does not take place with respect to the perishable commodities in the Wilson amendment.

I believe the Wilson amendment would make what the Senator from Wyoming is trying to do more workable. If you get that one section taken care of so that it is, so to speak, out of the closet, then the segments of industry where illegal immigration is really a problem will come to the surface where people can see it. It will be easier to isolate the problem.

I said this in the debate the last time. If you go into most any restaurant in the major metropolitan area of Washington, DC, and go back in the kitchen and pull your Senate card out and yell, "Immigration," probably half of the people working in the restaurant are going to run for the door. I think we are being unrealistic here.

To put the farmers in the situation, as Senator McCLURE has pointed out, where they have to make a choice of losing their farms or hiring people who are available to work is unacceptable. These folks are here because they are seeking honest employment to raise their families. Why not get it up on the surface, as Senator WILSON is suggesting, so that they can have a decent place to stay, so they do not have to hide and run from the law?

I just think it is a much more humane way to go about the problem. I hope the Senator will not oppose it with too much enthusiasm. I will also cite one other point if the Senator will yield for 1 more second. We all know the problem of American agriculture, and the major problem is that grain is too cheap competing on international markets for all kinds of reasons. If we drive people out of perishable commodity production in Idaho—Senator McCLURE mentioned 10,000 cars of onions, 25,000 cars of potatoes—if those people start producing wheat because they cannot hire the workers legally, they are going to be producing a crop that they certainly can produce a lot of. On all of this ground on which they grow potatoes and onions, they will grow 125 bushels of wheat per acre.

What are they going to do with it? Are they going to stack it in the Government bins? We as taxpayers will pay for that too.

I think there is a really good argument here. I hope my colleagues do not look over the very logical argument, and I think a very reasonable argument to accept this amendment. I hope my colleague will not oppose it too vigorously because I think it will help him achieve the goals that he has worked for for so long.

I thank you for yielding. I apologize for interfering with your time.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I enjoy debating with Senator SYMMS. He is a spirited proponent of his position. I will just say I think this should be kept in mind as we talk about the crops applied to the farmer. Let us keep in mind that 95 percent of the farm money that we are going to cough up very soon—and it will be quite a figure—goes to six basic commodities, none of which are dealt with in this particular amendment. The biggest chunk, the awesome chunk, the 95- to 97-percent chunk of farm money goes to the six basic commodities: wheat, corn, tobacco, peanuts, rice, and cotton. It does not go in any sense to the products that are here called perishable products.

Mr. SYMMS. The Senator is making my point. Why create a situation where these people who are growing perishable commodities stop growing them and start growing something in the Government program? Let us encourage them to keep growing perishable commodities and keep it out of the program so we have less to contend with here on the Senate floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have learned that many in America have learned not just to work the land but to work the programs. So that does happen in our country. That is why we put a 3-year transitional program together. That is part of S. 1200, to wean growers off of the illegal work force. That is why we put in expedited procedures. That is why we took care of historical ranching operations like sheep herding. That is in here. All that is in S. 1200. There is not anything that we did not address. But what we are never able to do is satisfy the perishable fruit industry. There is no way I can do that. I could accept this amendment—which I am not going to do—I am going to resist it with vigor. But even if it were accepted this bill would not be acceptable to Senator WILSON or to those who speak. Each of you have already indicated in past votes that you cannot support immigration reform. I understand that.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. In the first place, I would assume that the point you are making is purely for education, but it seems to me that what we should be doing is arguing amendments on the merits of the basic amendment that is pending. I can certainly understand there is a certain amount of horse trading that goes on. But I do not think that if you listen this afternoon anyone who listened carefully thinks that everyone who is supporting this amendment is opposed to the basic bill. This is simply not the case. There are several people strongly in support of the measure of the Senator from Wyoming who are equally strong in their support of this amendment because they have recognized that good intentions are not enough; that while the rest of the bill may be drafted to deal with other subjects, it does not deal adequately with the subject of perishable commodities.

I must tell the Senator that earlier today he was gracious enough to comment on our personal relationship which is one that with him I treasure. But at the same time, he commented that it was impossible for anyone from California to support his measure. The implication was that there were pressures there that made it impossible.

Let me take a moment to share with my friend from Wyoming and anyone else who may be interested in a few rather general feelings that I have about the Senator's legislation.

He is right in trying to deal with what is a monumental set of problems. The Senator has made a magnificent effort to do so. But the effort in my judgment is flawed. There are some serious problems. I think there are problems, correctly identified by some who fear that there will be defensive discrimination on the part of small businessmen and women when as employers they are faced with the propsect of the possible hassle of Federal prosecution if they hire an illegal alien by mistake. So in order to avoid that possibility many are going to look and listen to job applicants. And if they see one who sounds or looks foreign without saying to anyone that they are doing so, they may very well seek to avoid the possibility of prosecution by opting in favor of those who look and sound as though they were U.S. citizens even though many U.S. citizens, particularly those of Hispanic ancestry, look and sound foreign but are in fact U.S. citizens entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizenship.

There are other problems with the legislation. But the basic problem has to do with the fundamental assumption that employer sanctions are somehow going to stem this massive flow of illegal immigration. I should tell my friend from Wyoming that I suspect that no one else on this floor has considered the problem of illegal immigration from quite the same vantage point as have I for many, many years before I came to this body as a citizen of San Diego County, as a resident of that county in the southwestern corner of the United States. My home was in a community that is literally on the Mexican border. It is a fact that it is the busiest international crossing in the world. That is counting the legal crossings. It is a lot busier than that because of the massive nightly illegal immigration into the United States, not just through San Diego County, but all along that very porous, 1,800-mile long, undefended border.

I was mayor of that city for 11 years. During the time that I served as mayor, it grew from 14 to the 17th most populace in the United States. Because of my concern with the growth of that city and accommodating that growth, I found myself better than half my waking scrambling engaged in the business of economic development, trying to provide the job base necessary to put this growing population to work.

If this seems a digression to you, let me illustrate its relevance. We discovered both through experience and also through econometric studies aimed at determining what motivated migration into our community that many who could legally migrate from the Frost Belt did so even though they were reasonably assured that they would not find employment in their new home of choice because they apparently reasoned as they were standing in the cold and drear of Buffalo or Hamtramck on a winter afternoon waiting for their unemployment check that they might just as well be unemployed in the sun of San Antonio, or Phoenix or San Diego or Miami as where they were unemployed in less sanguine circumstances.

My friends, if that is true for those in that circumstance, it is true in spades for those who are unable to eke out any kind of living or who cannot very realistically see the aspirations they enjoy for their children coming to any fruition, in a nation that does not enjoy any of the benefits which the United States citizenship confers. What I am saying very simply is that I think we very likely delude ourselves, that employer sanctions even if we were to persuade every Mexican, every Salvadoran, every Jamaican, and every Haitian that they would never work in the United States—that they were guaranteed unemployment here—they would come anyway. They would come bringing their families because they seek better medical care, better education, better opportunity in what they view quite properly as a land of far greater opportunity than those from which they have come.

Unless there be time to conduct this experiment, I personally doubt that employer sanctions will make a 10 or 15 percent difference in the number of people who come. I think they will come in any case. Hope will spring eternal. They will think perhaps they can evade all the elaborate mechanisms. But they will come for the reasons I have indicated.

Perhaps we need to engage in this experiment if only to illustrate that, in fact, it is not an adequate response. Then we will have to come to grips with the hard reality of what is an adequate response.

In the meantime, it makes no sense to kill industries in this country in the name of immigration reform.

Having purged myself of those personal observations, and I assure my friend from Wyoming they are heartfelt, let me respond to things which he has said and others have said—although as I come to think of it, he yielded to me, and if he wishes to complete his statement——

Mr. SIMPSON. I would appreciate your saying things, but I believe if we can get on, I will be able to tell my colleagues whether we are going to be here tonight or whether we are going to be here tomorrow.

Mr. WILSON. I will continue with apologies to my friend from the great State of New York.

Let me get to the comments that have been made with respect to this amendment.

It has been not just suggested but stated that this amendment requires that this is an open-ended program and brings an unlimited number of seasonal workers into the United States.

That simply is not true. The fact of the matter is the Attorney General has the discretion to determine whether anyone comes, and he has within that discretion the authority to decide that no one can come. He must take into account stated objective criteria that have do to with the availability of domestic labor, that have to do with the stated need in the applications of growers, and then, after a 3-year period of administering this law on a regional and month-by-month basis, he then is required, not given discretion but directed, to set a cap in any region which will determine month by month the absolute limit of the number of seasonal workers who would be permitted into the United States for a temporary period. They are, in fact, seasonal workers.

So that statement is simply flatly false.

When he comes to make this exercise of discretion, among the criteria that he must consider are the historical usage of foreign workers in each of the growing regions; the efforts of the Secretary of Labor to recruit domestic workers to perform the work in question; basically, the availability of willing, able, and qualfied domestic workers. He is, to be certain, required to consider the grower petitions, but they are but one element in all of the objective criteria that must receive consideration.

It is he, the Attorney General and not the growers, who has the authority to determine who will come.

There is no such thing as simply getting foreign workers on demand. That is the impression that is sought to be created here, but it is simply false.

This is not an open-ended amendment. It requires the Attorney General to set the actual number of workers 3 years after its effective date.

Perhaps the most offensive thing that has been said this afternoon is that this is a bracero program. That is flatly false. I take the strongest exception to it.

I can well imagine young Al Simpson as a cub lawyer doing pro bono work for the victims of the kind of abusive exploitation that has befallen all too many braceros. But to say that this is the program which during the 1940's and 1950's subjected people to that is more than utter nonsense; it is untrue and it is unfair.

There were not, during the bracero program, any of the obligations which this amendment imposes upon employers. There were no worker protections. There was no housing for them nor any requirement for a housing allowance. Certainly, there was no workman's compensation or other insurance. Certainly, under the old bracero program, and indeed under the H-2 provisions in existing law and in S. 1200, workers are tied to a single employer.

What recourse did they have, and, indeed, what recourse do they have, if they find themselves exploited or abused by that employer?

In contrast, this amendment affords to them the opportunity to move freely in accordance with the marketplace and their own desires through one of 10 regions in the United States, which divide the United States into 10 geographic areas. They are large areas.

Before my friend from Massachusetts leaves this floor, I must say I find invidious the comparison with past law. In the first place the law, past law on South Africa applies to South Africa. Indeed, I do not understand——

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will in a moment.

I cannot understand how specifically someone will oppose the point of view that you will allow the market to dictate free movement within an entire geographic region and still consistently support a program that ties them to a single employer. That refers to another institution called slavery.

Let us leave off demagoguery and get to the facts in the case. The facts are that without this amendment, a situation of growers of perishable commodities will be that which Senator GORTON and Senator SYMMS have so adequately described. Senator SYMMS came to me on the floor and he said, "Do they not understand that, with the situation being what it is, that the growers who wish to do right by their employees are constantly in fear as are the employees themselves that the INS will come swooping down?"

That is no way for either the employer or the employee to live. They ought to live with the certainty of a law which requires certain obligations on the part of the employers. It should guarantee workers' rights. The current situation does not do that.

Let me come to the point about the failure to actually give the H-2 Program a fair try.

The H-2 Program has been tried in the West and, indeed, has been tried across the country. Let me give you some examples, a few citations.

A large grower in Arizona using the H-2 provisions complains bitterly to me about thousands of dollars spent in litigation with the Department of Labor on regulatory issues. His case is by no means unique. While he may be large enough to afford it, most of the people who grow perishable commodities, this special interest, so-called, are, in fact, small farmers. Their farms are less than 200 acres. They are not gigantic spreads. They cannot afford that kind of litigation.

The same thing has been the experience of California growers. Indeed, bad experiences are not limited to Arizona and California. A potato grower in Wyoming drove many miles to the nearest Labor Department office to apply for an H-2 permit. In spite of extensive efforts on his part, the Department of Labor did not act quickly and ultimately refused to approve participation in the H-2 Program, even though there were no available domestic workers. Of course, what has happened as a result of that is that quite reasonably, quite naturally, others, seeing the bitter experience of those who have tried the H-2 Program, have concluded that it is not for them.

My friend in Wyoming has sought to address what everybody has acknowledged are the shortcomings of the existing H-2 Program. He speaks of streamlining it. He has sought to reduce the time needed to predict the weather from 85 to 60 days.

This afternoon he has sought to indicate that the present provisions of the program are adequate to the needs of the growers of commodities. They are not. Last year, there were only 20,000 H-2 permits processed the entire year—20,000. They would be overwhelmed by the kind of experiences currently going on in Fresno, where the interruption of the harvest has put 60,000 people searching for other employment.

What are those people going to do when the sun shines and they are going to have to scramble to get those workers back? Are they going to say, "Oh, boy, I hope the Department of Labor can, within 3 days, respond to a need that exists right now?" The Department of Labor would be overwhelmed.

The Department has very, very limited expertise, I should tell my friend from Illinois, with respect to this very specialized subject of agricultural labor. They are not experts in it, they do not profess to be.

Let me just say this, Mr. President: 53,000 small farmers, as my friend from Massachusetts has told us, 53,000 small family farmers, in his judgment, may be a special interest. In mine, it is an industry that is deserving of at least cooperation and sympathy from its government, not well-intentioned, misguided bureaucratic requirements that virtually doom the success of the particularly precarious and risky business which they have chosen. They are entitled, I think, not just to sympathy but to regulations that work. They are willing and able to undergo all the obligations that this amendment will impose upon them.

Without this amendment, they will, in fact, be what we heard described this afternoon again and again as the situation of either breaking the law or losing the farm. That is not an acceptable choice and it cannot be made so or dignified in anything but misguided, remarkably cruel thinking by calling it essential to the passage of reform legislation.

Let me finally make a point about the reform or the passage of reform legislation. The critics of this amendment, for reasons that may or may not be relevant, have determined that they are going to dub this the killer amendment. The killer amendment passed the House of Representatives, my friend from Wyoming says, by 68 votes. That is even more than I had thought. But it was a lopsided win and far more than the handful by which the basic bill was passed. It seems to me that more than an argument can be made that without this amendment, it might not have passed the House of Representatives. But I will say that if there is anyone in the House of Representatives who says that they will not take up this legislation or they will prohibit its being considered because it contains this amendment, if they are saying that the price of their considering immigration reform legislation is to doom an entire industry of 53,000 small family farmers, then I say that is unacceptable. It is not a reason to vote against this amendment; however well-intentioned that argument, it misses by a mile.

We cannot accept it as justification for turning away from the needed attention, the needed reform in the regulations that now seek to govern—hopelessly—this industry, which deserves not just our sympathy but our realistic help.

Mr. President, this legislation is multifaceted. There will be other amendments, but I do not think there is any other amendment that goes quite so basically to the element of fairness. We have been urged this afternoon by opponents of the amendment to consider American jobs. We are all going to be considering American jobs at great length, again and again, this fall.

I am considering the American jobs that will be lost in a hemorrhage if this amendment is not adopted—jobs in packing sheds, in processing and freezing plants, in truck yards, in grocery stores, in warehouses. And we can only guess how many tens of thousands all across the country will depend on the timely harvest of blueberries in Maine or apples picked by Jamaicans in Vermont, apples in upstate New York, or grapes. It is true in Minnesota, it is true in Idaho, it is true of cherries and apples in Washington State and asparagus. It is true throughout the Southwest. It is true all over the Nation, that the small family farmers who are engaged in this risky business need our help.

They are right to ask, it; we will be wrong to deny it.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for yielding. If I recall correctly, the statistics indicate that somewhere between 8 and 15 percent of all illegal aliens in the United States are employed in agriculture. But if I remember the deportation figure, the deportations of illegal aliens will exceed 1 million a year. Of that, over 900,000 are from agricultural labor. I would not suggest at all that that means a million illegal aliens have been deported, because I think many of them are the same people imported more than once. In Idaho, we figure the turnaround time is about 4 days. If they are really determined when they get back to Mexico, they are back up to Idaho within 4 days. Then it takes INS a while to locate them again. The same person may be deported more than once in a year.

But let me ask the Senator from Wyoming, am I right on those general figures of the number of illegal aliens and the number of deportations, and where do those deportations originate?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the Senator is correct about the fact that only about 8 to 15 percent of the illegal undocumented population work in agriculture. That is correct.

With regard to what he defines as deportation, I respectfully say that of the 1 million-plus apprehensions—and there were 1 million point 2, I think, in the past year, we think we apprehend 1 out of 2 or 1 out of 3. But of those apprehensions, the great bulk—in fact, 95 percent of them go back on what is called voluntary departure. There is not a deportation that takes place.

Mr. McCLURE. I understand that a good many of them wait until the end of the season and turn themselves in so they get their way home paid by the taxpayers of the United States. That is perhaps another anomaly of the current situation. But, yes, I think a high percentage are indeed on voluntary departures.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is true and I would say that in those voluntary departures at the border, agriculture is rather heavily represented on that border, without question. But over 90 percent of the apprehensions are at the border and not internally.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I would first like to commend our distinguished colleague from Wyoming for his unequalled perseverance in leading the drive for a crucial reform of our immigration laws. As usual, Senator SIMPSON's approach to the task has been a mix of logic, patience, compassion, and plain common sense.

When the effort to reform our immigration laws began approximately 10 years ago, we recognized the need to maintain control over our borders in order to ensure the social integrity of the Nation and to protect our economic stability. Now I believe that there is a more pressing problem; we must recognize our obligation to protect the security of the Nation.

Throughout the world, we are witnessing a rising tide of violence—violence directed predominantly toward the citizens and interests of the United Sates. Fortunately, we have experienced relatively little terrorist violence within our borders, but we must not grow complacent about the existence of the threat. If we continue to lose control over the flow of people across our borders, we will become a progressively easier target for internationally active terrorist organizations. Although strengthening our borders alone cannot protect us against the threat, it is an essential step toward that goal, and it is one that I hope we will undertake this year.

Mr. President, no one can seriously argue with the proposition that it is the promise of greater economic opportunity that draws the vast majority of illegal aliens into our country. As long as we maintain the current law which makes it illegal for an alien to work but legal for an employer to give that alien a job, then the flow of illegal immigration will persist.

Mr. President, despite all of the criticism that has been leveled at the effort to reform our immigration laws year after year, I believe that Senator SIMPSON's bill takes the most logical, effective approach to reducing illegal immigration by eliminating the economic magnet that draws people into our country illegally while enhancing the resources of our enforcement agencies. I am confident that this approach will return to us some semblance of control over our borders.

In an area as complex and controversial as immigration reform, it will be impossible, as Senator Simpson will attest, to satisfy every interested or affected group. Our goal, of course, is to enact a bill that will be effective while causing as little unnecessary hardship as possible. The bill attempts to do that by recognizing the reality that the population of illegal aliens within our society has, to a large extent, become a significant factor, both socially and economically.

In that regard, we must face the fact that, because of their unpredictable, weather-dependent harvest deadlines, growers of perishable commodities have become dependent on a highly mobile migrant work force, a large portion of which is made up of illegal aliens. These growers will be severely affected and may face economic ruin if they are unable to fill their harvesting needs from the domestic work force or acquire an adequate number of workers through the expanded temporary worker mechanisms provided in the bill.

In Alabama we have 450 to 500 commercial fruit farms. The most important of these crops economically for the State is the peach crop, which also is one of the most perishable. Alabama is also developing a large blueberry industry. Blueberries, too, are a very perishable crop.

All of these crops are very labor intensive. Thus Alabama farmers are dependent upon both a local work force plus a migrant work force which originates in Florida and works its way up the east coast. As Alabama becomes more and more industrialized, the local work force available to these fruit growers will decline and they will grow increasingly dependent on migrant workers. If these farmers do not have access to a highly flexible, readily available foreign work force, I am afraid that they will eventually face economic disaster.

I know that my distinguished colleague from Wyoming believes that the provisions already in the bill are sufficient to meet the needs of the growers of perishable crops. On the other hand, the farmers themselves present convincing arguments that they will need more flexibility as provided in Senator WILSON's amendment. I hope that we will make sure that we recognize the situation of the growers of perishable crops while, at the same time, providing adequate protection for our domestic work force and implementing sufficient incentives for the temporary workers to return to their country of origin when their work is completed. I believe Senator Wilson's amendment does all of these, and I strongly urge my colleagues to pass this important legislation with the Wilson amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from California, [Mr. WILSON] which would augment the current H-2 provisions of S. 1200 by establishing a seasonal agricultural worker program for the perishable commodity industry.

I believe reform of the Nation's immigration laws is long overdue and I commend the Senator from Wyoming's [Mr. SIMPSON] invaluable contribution in this area. Immigration reform is premised on two very important objectives: to regain control of U.S. borders and to stop the exploitation of defenseless workers, S. 1200 contains substantive provisions to address the first objective such as employer sanctions and increased funding for our border patrol. In our efforts to achieve this second important objective we cannot turn our back on the needs of farmers in the perishable crops industry. This industry has relied heavily on foreign labor for approximately 50 years. We cannot ignore the reality that many of these workers are in the United States illegally. Furthermore, there is no guarantee that once we stem the flow of illegal immigration, adequate numbers of domestic workers will fill such jobs.

As currently drafted, S. 1200 fails to recognize the unique and legitimate needs of producers of perishable commodities. The pending amendment would eliminate the rigid aspects of the H-2 program that make it unacceptable to the production of perishable commodities.

Before highlighting the key provisions of the amendment I must emphasize that the nature of the perishable crops industry is heavily labor-intensive and strongly susceptible to changing weather conditions. These factors are essential in evaluating the adequacy of the H-2 provisions of S. 1200.

The proposed amendment would not supplant the H-2 provisons of S. 1200. Rather, it would supplement H-2 with a seasonal worker program available only to those involved with the production of perishable commodities. It would not be an open-ended program as many opponents allege. The Attorney General would admit foreign workers to perishable agriculture only after he determines, in consultation with the Secretaries of Labor and Agriculture, that there is an insufficient number of domestic workers to meet the needs of producers.

It is important to emphasize that the number of workers needed in the perishable commodities industry will not change. If this amendment is not adopted and we find, as I suspect we will, that an inadequate number of domestic workers are available, workers will be brought in anyway under H-2. The irony is that the existing program is simply unworkable, especially in the West, because of its time and mobility constraints. For example, under S. 1200 growers are required to predict weeks in advance how many workers they will need and when. The volatile nature of the perishable crops industry makes this requirement unrealistic.

In the State of Washington, cherries represent a significant part of the perishable comodities industry. They can be harvested in less than 2 weeks; however, they can be made unharvestable in an even shorter amount of time given the probability of rain. Weather, which is a most uncontrollable characteristic, can make crops such as peaches ripen much more quickly than anticipated. These factors are critical when considering the unique needs of this industry.

We must also consider the importance of the perishable commodities industry in light of our international trade efforts. The State of Washington, for example, employes about 30,000 workers during the harvest season. Fresh cherries have recently become an exportable item and we now export an estimated 20 percent of our apple crop to foreign nations. A substantial number of new jobs will be created with continued expansion of our export of perishable commodities.

There are a number of significant safeguards in the pending amendment. To participate in the program, growers would have to make a good faith effort to recruit domestic workers. In addition they would have to provide wages and working conditions that must be comparable to those given domestic workers. They would not be allowed to depress wages and working conditions for domestic workers. Growers would also have to provide housing or a housing allowance to foreign workers as well as workmen's compensation or its equivalent.

The amendment contains strong incentives to encourage foreign workers to return to their home countries by withholding a portion of their wages which would be returned to them through the U.S. consulate upon their departure from the United States in compliance with the terms of their visas.

Mr. President, in conclusion, the pending amendment is in the best interests of the Nation's perishable commodities industry, consumers, and both foreign and domestic workers. It is consistent with our essential objective of immigration reform because it would provide both foreign and domestic workers with adequate protections and guaranteed rights. I urge my colleagues to suport this most important addition to the existing H-2 provisions of S. 1200

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me conclude just by saying that what Senator WILSON says shows the sensitivity of a man who was mayor of the municipality of San Diego. That I can understand. There is not any need to develop it further, except he is after the same approach I am: that is humane immigration reform. We are both on the same track. Hopefully, we can do it before we get to methods that are not humane or less fitting to our country, like 2,000 miles of barbed wire, "cactus curtains," or some other recommendations I have had made to me as chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee.

I admire the intensity of his feeling. I will not go any further. I do not believe we have any further persons to speak on our side of the issue.

Therefore, I move to table the Wilson amendment. The yeas and nays have already been called for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to table only the second-degree amendment and leave the first-degree amendment before the Senate, or does he wish to table the first-degree amendment which would take the second-degree one with it?

Mr. SIMPSON. I would prefer the latter approach.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then he would table the Hatch amendment as well?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes, Mr. President, which would take both of them down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish the yeas and nays?

Mr. SIMPSON. They have been requested. I renew that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Utah. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GORTON]. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 48, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

East Pryor

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment (No. 594) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CHILES was recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, may we have order,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is correct. The Senate will be in order.

Will Members and staff please take their conversation elsewhere or take their seats?

The Senate is still not in order. Senators will take their seats or cease their conversations.

The Senate is not in order.

SCHEDULE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to ask some questions of the distinguished majority leader about the program for the remainder of the day.

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader. It is my understanding that the Chiles amendment will be accepted. Then there is a possibility of turning to an amendment by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, which would take a couple of hours and maybe longer. That would be disposed of this evening.

Then the distinguished Senator from Idaho indicated he had an amendment to be disposed of rather quickly. That would still leave about six amendments, I understand, that require yeas and nays.

It is also my understanding that the managers would then go out tonight and try to complete action on the bill tomorrow, if I might ask that of the distinguished manager.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there are about six amendments that would appear to call for a rollcall vote. There is an amendment of Senator KERRY, on which there is a proposed time agreement by a unanimous-consent request. I am not aware of what the outcome of that might be. I understood at one time that it was agreed that it would be 1½ hours, with 1 hour by the proponents and a half-hour for the opponents, with no amendment or any amendment procedures, to be culminated with a motion to table. That has not been presented as a unanimous-consent request yet.

After that, I would think we will have the McClure amendments, the English language amendment, and also a search warrant amendment which can become a bit contentious.

The remaining amendments should be within a good time limit.

But I would not indicate to you that we would finish before 8 or 9 o'clock. I think it would probably go further than that. Therefore, probably to come in tomorrow would be the best thing to do so people might accommodate themselves this evening.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the majority leader would be prepared, if it was satisfactory to the managers of the bill, because I know of some Senators who have official commitments tomorrow, if those who have amendments were here tomorrow and could complete action on those amendments, we would then vote on those amendments on Tuesday, because I have already indicated there would be no votes on Monday, which is a Jewish holiday.

If that might be acceptable to those who have official plans starting tomorrow, maybe we could check that out between now and the next vote. So we will probably stay in until about 8 or 8:30 this evening and if those who have amendments were available tomorrow, if it were satisfactory to the managers and they have no objection, we could then postpone votes but complete action on the amendments and have the votes on Tuesday next.

Mr. BYRD. Will the distinguished majority leader then be willing to inquire as to what amendments may be called up and who the authors may be? That would help us. Then we could proceed to check with our cloakrooms to see if other Senators have amendments and we could get some idea now of what amendments were going to be called up and whether or not Senators would be willing to have time limitations on them. It might help the majority leader in the decision that he will make.

Mr. CRANSTON. If the majority leader will yield, I have one, two, or possibly three amendments, and I could bring up all of these tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. Will there be rollcalls required on each?

Mr. CRANSTON. I am not certain; probably one. I am not certain yet. We will try to work them out with managers handling the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have two amendments and the chairman of the subcommittee is familiar with both of them. One of them I believe goes to the heart of the whole legislation, and that is the legalization provisions. I did not understand earlier in the day that we might get into this process.

The other amendment is important, as well, and I have been in conference with the chairman of the committee on that.

Quite frankly, on the legalization issue, on that particular amendment, I would insist that we have an opportunity to have a discussion with Members here. It reaches to the heart of this whole legislation. We addressed this issue the last two Congresses we debated this bill. The two essential aspects are the enforcement provision and the legalization, and this amendment deals with that program. I think it is a very important issue.

I am glad to accommodate the leader on the question of time, but if you are going to go to a latter time, I would request at least that we have a reasonable chance to consider that and then move to a vote. But I am glad to accommodate the leader's request.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we might be able to work out something for time on each side before the vote on that amendment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I have two amendments, both of which ought to be fairly brief and one of which would require a rollcall vote.

Mr. DOLE. As I understand it, Senator CHILES has an amendment, Senator HAWKINS has an amendment, Senator MCCLURE has two amendments, Senator CRANSTON has three amendments, Senator HART possibly has an amendment, Senator GRAMM has two amendments, Senator METZENBAUM——

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have three amendments.

Mr. DOLE. Three amendments; Senator KENNEDY has two amendments, Senator MOYNIHAN has an amendment, Senator EXON has one amendment.

Will that require a rollcall vote?

Mr. EXON. It very likely will require a rollcall, but I can be here to present it tomorrow.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. DECONCINI. Is it possible to resolve now whether we are going to have votes tomorrow or on Tuesday? If we are going to have them tomorrow, we should just say so.

Mr. DOLE. That is what we are trying to resolve now. Some want to do it tomorrow and some want to do it Tuesday.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. As I understand it those who are offering amendments and have indicated they have amendments will be available tomorrow.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the majority leader for yielding.

One of the things that concerns me is that we just had a vote here that was 48 to 50 which is devastating to the produce industry in the West. I hesitate to see us debate this on Friday when there will be a small group of Members present if there are no votes.

The employer sanctions that are in the bill now become a much bigger issue because of the way the vote just turned out on the Wilson amendment. I hope that if the employer sanctions amendment is brought up it would be voted on the day it is debated, because it is very important at this point. As the Senator from Massachusetts mentioned on the other amendment, it is right at the heart of the discrimination factor of this bill. I believe, with the way the last vote came out, that the stage is set for a lot of discrimination with the employer sanctions.

Mr. DOLE. I am inclined to believe, just checking with the managers, that they would prefer that we just do what we planned to do this evening: vote on the Kerry amendment and perhaps one McClure amendment and then come back tomorrow and just have another full day. Unless we can change that somehow, that will probably be the program.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I think that the comanager and I have indicated that we would proceed with this bill. I believe people have made their plans based on that. I think we can dispose of the Chiles amendment and perhaps the Kerry amendment and the McClure amendment and then tomorrow we would process the bill and continue.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be glad to enter into a time agreement on those two amendments.

Mr. DOLE. Let me get back to the distinguished minority leader, but it appears that we would have a session tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader and I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida.

AMENDMENT NO. 596

(Purpose: to modify the definition of a special Cuban or Haitian entrant, and for other purposes)

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN). The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES] proposes an amendment numbered 596.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 75, line 8, strike "December 31, 1980" and insert in lieu thereof "October 14, 1981".

On page 76, line 8, strike "January 1, 1981" and insert in lieu thereof "October 15, 1981".

On page 76, line 10, strike "December 31, 1980" and insert in lieu thereof "October 14, 1981".

Beginning on page 76 with line 11 strike out all through line 25 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(ii) a national of Haiti who has established a record with the Immigration and Naturalization Service before October 15, 1981, and who was physically present in the United States on that date; or

On page 77, line 1, strike "(iv)" and insert in lieu thereof "(iii)".

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment that will extend the deadline for granting legal status to Cubans and Haitians who have been in the United States prior to October 15, 1981.

Everyone will recall the boatlifts of 1980 which brought thousands of Cubans and Haitians to Florida. Many of these people came to the United States with the understanding that they had this Nation's approval. Indecisiveness and lack of immigration policy by the administration resulted in thousands believing that they had free passage into this country.

Once in the United States, many of these people were given a special Cuban/Haitian entrant status by the administration. Almost all of these persons are known to the Immigration and Naturalization Service and they are recognized by the administration as a class who entered during the boatlift.

My amendment would simply extend the date in S. 1200 for granting legal status to this group from January 1, 1981 to October 15, 1981. This means that any Cuban or Haitian who entered the United States before October 15, 1981, who is still physically present in the United States, and who meets U.S. immigration eligibility requirements would be eligible for legal status.

The October date is important as it was then that the U.S. Government finally took definite action and started an interdiction program with the Haitian Government which authorized U.S. Coast Guard vessels to return undocumented Haitians to Port-au-Prince. This is a clear declaration of U.S. policy that it is illegal to enter without papers unless the alien has legitimate claims to asylum.

Mr. President, I want to stress that these people are known to the Immigration and Naturalization Service and have been recognized by our Government as a special class. They have been in a legal limbo awaiting further action by the U.S. Government. My amendment would provide the authority for our Government to give them legal status in the United States.

Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the chairman and ranking member of the committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, this is an issue of importance to the Senator from Florida and to the rest of us. I will speak for 1 minute.

All of the Cubans arriving prior to October 20, 1980, were given a very special Cuban-Haitian entrance status. All of those arriving after that date were determined to be illegal. The Haitians were given the status until December 1980, so I believe January 1, 1981, is an appropriate date. But the United States did not institute the policy of interdiction until October 1981, where we gave our first big signal as to what we intended to do. So I think a cutoff of October 15, 1981—and that is Senator HAWKINS' amendment—is not unreasonable. Legalization of those people should, I think, remain triggered because of the threat of illegal immigration from these countries, and until enforcement is in place that is going to remain quite great. But the entrants are in no danger of being deported at the present time or in the future, in any event.

Mr. CHILES. No. They are all loose, and working.

Mr. SIMPSON. Therefore, I am willing at least on this side of the issue to accept the amendment and yield to Senator KENNEDY.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think the chairman of the committee has made the case very well. I hope we will move forward with the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment (No. 596) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, has the distinguished Senator offered his amendment?

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I intend to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand this amendment will be offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, and that the chairman of the Armed Services Committee is willing to enter into a time agreement—an hour for the proponents, and a half-hour for the opponents. Then the Senator probably will move to table the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I very reluctantly agree. No. 1, I do not think this is a matter that is germane to the immigration bill; and, No. 2, I remind my friend from Massachusetts that this test is going to be conducted tomorrow. I do not care what happens in this body. The test is going to be conducted. Since I had my discussion first on the floor, I indicated to my friend from Massachusetts an hour for his presentation, although I said that we can bring General Abramson in here to run the whole show, and he could explain the whole thing in 10 minutes. That would be all right—and half an hour for our side. I do not like to hold up the Senate that long on something that I frankly do not see any need for, particularly when the test is going to be conducted tomorrow. This section will have absolutely no effect on it at all. But I am not going to oppose the time method which the chairman of the committee has agreed to, or that the leadership has agreed to. I just do not like to sit around here that long.

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator object to that time agreement?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No. I cannot object to it.

Mr. DOLE. I make that request.

Mr. BYRD. What is the request?

Mr. DOLE. That on the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts there be a time agreement of 1 hour for the proponents, ½ hour for the opponents, and that no amendments be in order to the amendment.

Mr. SYMMS. Reserving the right to object, will the distinguished majority leader cut that in half? We are trying to concentrate on immigration legislation. If you can cut that in half, it would be less in the way, and interfering with the normal duties of the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. As I understand it, may be cut more than half on this side, Hopefully, after the agreement is reached, it will not take an hour on that side. So I think we can probably do it rather quickly.

Mr. KERRY. Will the majority leader yield? Mr. Leader, I will endeavor to yield back as much time as possible. I doubt that we will use the full hour. I will certainly try not to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection if the request is as the distinguished majority leader said—no amendments to the amendment would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Are we going to table it?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wanted to make sure that the debate will end tonight, and we will not resume the debate Tuesday before a vote.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, no. We are going to vote on this in about 1 hour, I hope, or less.

AMENDMENT NO. 597

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], on behalf of himself, and Senators HART, KENNEDY, WEICKER, SIMON, CRANSTON, PELL, and LARKIN, proposes an amendment numbered 597.

On page 125, after line 23, add the following new title:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. DELAY OF ANTI-SATELLITE WEAPON TEST.

(a) CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the President of the United States and the head of the Soviet Union have agreed to a summit conference scheduled to convene in Geneva, Switzerland, on November 19, 1985;

(2) that conference will present an extraordinary opportunity for an agreement in principle on measures to control the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union, including limitations on anti-satellite weapons; and

(3) a delay in the scheduled test of an anti-satellite weapon against an object in space by the United States until after the conclusion of the summit conference could greatly enhance the climate for fruitful discussions and facilitate the possibility for an accord on anti-satellite weapons.

(b) DELAY OF TEST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense may not carry out a test of the Space Defense System (anti-satellite weapon) against an object in space until after the conclusion of the summit conference between the President of the United States and the head of the Soviet Union referred to in subsection (a).

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I sent this amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senators HART, KENNEDY, WEICKER, SIMON, CRANSTON, PELL, and HARKIN.

I would like to say to the distinguished manager of the immigration bill that I recognize that it is not his choice nor really mine that we are discussing this amendment on this bill. If I had another vehicle, I would have chosen it. I appreciate the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee for his willingness to permit this issue to be aired in this manner in order to have opposing views heard.

Mr. President, I know we visited this issue before. It is not a new issue in the Senate. It is not a new issue even to this session. The reason that I am asking the Senate to take a stand tonight, before tomorrow's afternoon test firing of an antisatellite weapon, is that I believe, and many of my colleagues share the belief, that we have the unique opportunity to be able to take a step that might—not guaranteed but that might—open the door to more fruitful negotiations, and that certainly would put the United States on the highest moral ground with respect to the arms race and issues of weapons in space.

This amendment is a straightforward attempt to enhance the climate of the summit by preserving the status quo on ASAT's for a mere 9 weeks. It is not an effort to say we will never test. It is not an effort to take away from the President the ability to test. It is simply an effort to say that in the interest of trying to achieve an arms control agreement, in the interest of hopefully limiting the opening up of the window of space to space weapons, we will take this opportunity as the Senate, which has already expressed itself in its effort to secure limitations on antisatellite weapons, that we will do so now in the hopes that those 9 weeks might afford us the opportunity to do a better job of restraining the growth in those weapons.

I do not have to tell any of my colleagues here, many of whom have served in public life far longer than I and in far more important positions, the importance of the opportunity for a summit meeting. It takes place infrequently. Obviously, this particular summit is perhaps one of the most important in recent memory in the opportunities that it affords us.

We seek a 9-week delay by the United States in the face of a status quo that has existed for some 15 years and a weapons system that the Soviets have not tested since 1982. All we are asking for is 9 weeks of cushion to say that the United States is going to make its best effort and put the best foot forward in order to try to limit the further development of weapons in space designed to target and kill satellite.

The first issue that this amendment strives to speak to is the posture of the United States as it enters the summit. Do we or do we not wish to be perceived by the world as the nuclear superpower that is willing to go an extra step to seek real controls or a superpower that brazenly pushes aside a simple opportunity to show restraint?

In testing a new military technology, a homing device fired from underneath the wing of an F-15 aircraft, we will be testing a weapon that I happily acknowledge is superior to weapons of the Soviet Union. But in so doing right before the summit, Mr. President, I believe we play into the hands of those who want to play the propaganda game of characterizing the United States as being responsible for an increase in the space race.

By contrast, a decision by the United States not to test the antisatellite weapons before the summit could put the United States in the posture of offering the Soviets a special incentive to put forward an agreement in principle on limiting ASAT's and other weapons and could go a long way to alter the tone in which the United States prepares for the summit.

This amendment does not, and I repeat, Mr. President, it does not, prevent the President from going ahead with an Asat test after the summit if the Soviet Union fails to take a responsible position in Geneva.

Nine weeks.

I ask my colleagues to consider that on two prior occasions the Senate has gone on record as wanting to limit ASAT's. It did it when the distinguished Senator from Virginia joined with Senator Tsongas, my predecessor, and it did it again this year when the distinguished Senator from Virginia set up a certification process which did allow tests but which made it clear that there were specific conditions under which those tests should be conducted.

The second thing this amendment tries to do: It strives to respond to the continuing congressional belief that our satellites are important to us for the preservation of the security of our country. The continued security of our satellites is absolutely essential to our ability for command and control, for intelligence, and it is essential, moreover, to almost all of the major military objectives that we have with respect to deterring nuclear war.

If we open space up to a race that will jeopardize those satellites we, in fact, begin to jeopardize our own deterrent ability and we diminish our current posture of security.

The later we take action, Mr. President, the longer that we wait, the more possible it becomes that the Soviet Union will develop more sophisticated antisatellite weapons as will we and the more impossible it becomes to secure some kind of restraint on this dangerous technology.

Mr. President, these facts are not at issue in this Congress. These facts have been accepted by the Senate. That is precisely why we require the President to endeavor to negotiate the strictest possible ASAT limitations consistent with the national security of this country.

On August 20, while the Congress was in recess, as many of us predicted would happen, President Reagan informed us that the United States planned to conduct the first test of its new F-15 launched miniature homing vehicle against an object in space. It should be noted we have had two tests with this particular system. One was classified as a success; the other as a partial success. They were against a point in space.

At the time that he made the announcement, the President certified, as required by law, that the United States had endeavored in good faith to negotiate with the Soviet Union a mutual and verifiable agreement with the strictest possible limitations on antisatellite weapons consistent with the national security interests of the United States.

He also certified the other requirements with respect to carrying out a test. Specifically: he certified that pending agreement on such strict limitation, testing against objects in space by an antisatellite warhead of the United States is, in the language that Senator WARNER and others proposed that was passed by the Congress—that such a test must be necessary "to avert clear and irrevocable harm to the national security, that such testing would not constitute an irreversible step that would gravely impair prospects for negotiations on antisatellite weapons, and that such testing is fully consistent with the rights and obligations of the United States under the ABM Treaty of 1972."

Mr. President, to date there has been no close examination by this body of this certification. We pass a law. We require the President to certify. And yet no one in the Senate has formally examined that certification before this test takes place in such a way that we should decide whether or not we approve it.

Mr. President, I believe the certification does not accurately reflect reality and I even believe that it makes a mockery of reality in certain respects.

Let us just take a moment to review the facts.

First and most significantly, the planned test tomorrow—at least according to press accounts—does not come after the United States has conducted serious negotiations toward a treaty. As the President himself states in the certification document, the United States has been "unable to identify a specific ASAT proposal which meets the requirements defined by the Congress in 1984." Believing as it does that, in the words of the President's certification, "No arrangements or agreements beyond those already governing military activities in outer space have been found to date that are judged to be in the overall interest of the United States and its allies," the administration therefore—and we know this as a matter of record—has not undertaken negotiations on an ASAT treaty, which is specifically what the certification requires.

For the record, I would like to list at least five possible ASAT proposals the Reagan administration could have sought to negotiate, all of which would comply with the intent sought by Congress in the 1984 language. First, a ban on all testing, use and possession of all ASAT capability; second, a ban on testing, use and possession of dedicated ASAT's as opposed to all ASAT's—dedicated ASAT's; third, a ban on the use and testing but not the possession of dedicated Asat's; fourth, a ban on development or use of new types of ASAT's, no restrictions on existing ASAT systems; fifth, a ban on the use of ASAT's, no restrictions on possession or testing.

Now, I will concede there is some expert consensus that the first type of agreement is unattainable at the present time because some non-ASAT systems have some theoretical capability to serve as ASAT's. And we can point to the GALOSH system as an example of that. So residual capabilities would remain even if dedicated systems were banned.

But, Mr. President, the second type of agreement is something that we could negotiate if the administration desired, and it would help protect our satellites and it would limit competition in space weaponry. Even if the administration believes that verificiation problems prevent the second type of agreement, the second being a ban on testing and use of a dedicated Asat such as the system which the Soviets now have, then we could go into the third agreement or the fourth agreement or the fifth. Even the fifth type of agreement, despite its obvious limitations, is possible if the United States and Soviet Union chose to try to codify rules of the road.

Instead, the administration has said that no Asat proposal of any kind is in the national security interests of the United States and therefore has not sought to negotiate one—that is the clear reading of the language that has been submitted in the certification to the Congress.

Now, one reason that the administration gives for its refusal to negotiate an Asat Treaty is the issue of verification, that limits on Asat's are allegedly nonverifiable. But, Mr. President, I find it hard to believe how you can make that argument on the face of what we know today about the Soviet system by which assessment, Mr. President, we are now making the decision that we ought to go ahead and supposedly test. It is verification that has given us that very information. The truth is that despite the administration's claims that verification is an obstacle to any Asat agreement we know that they have a system. We know how big it is. We know how many tests have been conducted. We know how many of those tests have succeeded. We know how long it takes to intercept an object in space. We know in what orbital inclinations. We know they have not tested it in more than 3 years. We know from numerous nonclassified reports and testimony that in all it has been tested 20 times. We know it has failed to intercept a target 11 times, for an overall success rate of just 45 percent. We know the Soviet Asat is not exactly a modern state of the art weapon. It was introduced in 1968. We know it was lofted into orbit atop an SS-9 booster rocket, a large liquid fueled intercontinental ballistic missile, weighing more than 2,000 kilograms and 6 meters long. We know in each test it has been launched from Tyuratum into orbits with a narrow range of inclination. And we know that to test it the Soviets have launched satellites into orbits within the same range of inclination. We know it takes the Soviet ASAT one to two trips around the Earth before its orbit crosses that of the target and interception occurs. We know that it can only live for the period of those two revolutions and then because of its short life, because it is battery operated, it dies and it falls.

Mr. President, we know a great deal about the system and whatever the intent of the Soviet ASAT Program, it clearly does not today threaten most U.S. satellites. And that is a matter of record from various responsible officials in our military who have testified before our committees in a nonclassified fashion, and they have publicly stated that that level of threat is indeed minimal. The administration says it can reach 5,000 kilometers. We know it has never been tested at more than 2,400 kilometers. Now, that might enable the Soviet Asat system to threaten some few weather satellites and some military spy and communications satellites.

Mr. President, I am not saying to the distinguished Senator from Ohio or to the distinguished Senator from Virginia that this system cannot go up and knock down a couple of satellites. Yes, it can. But the majority of our most vital satellites are at much higher levels outside the range of this system. Mr. President, as sure as it has happened every time in the arms race, if we create a capability that is beyond that of the Soviet Union, they will surely follow.

There are also basic conceptual flaws in the Soviet system. First, the satellite can only be attacked when its ground track runs close to the launch site of the Asat system of the Soviet Union, a condition that is satisfied only for satellite orbits with inclinations higher than the latitude of the antisatellite's launch site. That only happens, Mr. President, twice a day, twice a day and there are delay periods of up to 6 hours or so, an average delay period of 6 hours before they can shoot.

When you put all this together, when you make a considered, rational judgment about U.S. security, about the threat to this Nation, it is difficult to understand how this particular system at this moment in time presents such a compelling and irrevocable danger to the United States that we cannot wait 9 weeks until the President sits down in Geneva and says to Mr. Gorbachev, "Are we really going to go ahead with this process?" I think in the interest of that effort we should take a second look. There is no reasonable military scenario arising between now and the summit meeting whereby the Soviet Asat threatens clear and irrevocable harm to the national security—clear and irrevocable harm to the national security.

Would it, if we went on interminably and they had an effective system? Yes, I would probably agree with the Senator from Ohio and others. But that is not what we are talking about. We are talking about whether or not at this moment in time that is the condition that exists.

I believe that the certification does not merit the stamp of approval of the U.S. Senate. I believe, instead, that a test of our Asat at this time against an object in space jeopardizes ultimately our national security; because if we do not get an agreement, then our satellites will ultimately also be threatened. We have much to lose from this. We rely on our satellites for information that is vital to our national defense, from command and control of our military forces to early warning of military attack. Our military forces are far-flung. We have bases around the world, and the preponderance of our nuclear weapons is located beyond our shores. If our satellites were to be threatened, we would risk the decapitation of both nuclear and conventional forces, making it difficult for the United States to maintain a credible response to a sneak attack.

As the United States begins flying more frequent space shuttle missions to service, to fly, and to bring fresh crews to continuously inhabited space stations, the threat to the U.S. interests from Soviet deployment of ASAT technology will continue to grow.

The long-term damage to our strategic security from the further development of ASAT technologies by both sides thus far outweighs whatever short-term theoretical advantage the administration has claimed from going ahead with the testing of our current ASAT.

It is for these reasons of national security that we moved to request the President to negotiate an ASAT Treaty with the strictest possible limitations. I believe that it remains in the interests of our national security that we reach such an accord on ASAT.

Mr. President, every scientist and every expert who has looked at this system will tell each and every Senator that this system we are testing tomorrow is superior, vastly superior—if it works—to the system of the Soviet Union. Every time any side has unilaterally made a technological breakthrough in the arms race, the other side has followed. That history and pattern of action and reaction has been the history of the arms race.

We exploded the first atomic bomb. The Soviets followed in 1949.

In 1948, we unveiled the first intercontinental bomber capable of carrying nuclear weapons. The Soviets followed suit 7 years later.

In 1952, we exploded the first hydrogen bomb, and the Soviets followed the next year.

In 1957, the Soviets launched the first satellite into orbit and perfected the first intercontinental ballistic missile. The United States followed suit on both scores within a year.

In 1960, the United States fired the first submarine-launched ballistic missile. The Soviets followed suit 8 years later.

In 1964, the United States developed the first multiple-warhead missile, and in 1968 the United States tested the first multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle. The Soviets did not score that breakthrough until 1973.

In 1982, we successfully completed testing the first long-range cruise missile and began bomber deployments of this system. In 1984, we began deployment of submarine-launched cruise missiles. The Soviets are still racing to catch up.

This action and reaction is the history of the arms race. If we are serious about trying to stop that arms race, if we are serious about not wanting to militarize space, then why is 9 weeks too much for us to ask to delay a test which might make it irrevocable for us to go back? Why? Because an F-15 is a mobile, already-deployed platform for firing this missile. That means that if we are successful in this test and you are a Soviet planner, you will say to yourself, "Every F-15 in the United States military has a potential ability of being a platform for firing this missile," and the arms race is out of control, and the ability to verify can be lost, and the ability for reaching an accord to limit this technology is also lost.

Remember the planning and strategy about MIRV. The distinguished Senator from Arizona was here then, and it was argued then that MIRV is going to be our response to the Soviet defensive ability.

When we deployed the MIRV, the Soviets and the United States had already agreed to the ABM treaty, and there was at that time no defensive or offensive threat that mandated our doing it, but we did it anyway.

The result today is that because they have 70 percent of their weapons in land-based missiles, they have developed, by MIRVing, a counterthreat which in fact has put at risk our land-based missiles; and by making that decision, we exposed ourselves to a danger and lessened our security. We are paying the price of that decision today. Today, we are trying to get rid of it, and today there is not a strategic planner who does not say that it was a mistake to MIRV. But we did it because we did not have the courage or the gumption to say no at that time.

I liken this decision about antisatellite weapons to the same process. This is the time to try to say no. As everybody who has been following the issue knows, antisatellite weapons testing is not limited merely to antisatellite goals and purposes. Antisatellite testing is integrally tied to our SDI capacity, to tracking midcourse flights, to doing a host of things which we cannot do under the ABM Treaty but which we can do in antisatellite testing.

Therefore, we risk the danger that we tie the two so closely together that, given the Soviet situation with respect to SDI, we may make the probability of success at the talks a real impossibility.

Mr. President, I know that even if this amendment were to be adopted today, this would not stop the test, because this bill will not be through Congress in that period of time.

So that is not what we are doing here, and I do not pretend that is what we are doing here. What we are doing here is trying to execute one of the most solemn responsibilities we have as U.S. Senators and which this body alone fundamentally has because of our purview over treaties and our purview over the nuclear arms race because of the jurisdictions of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Armed Services Committee.

I think it is important for U.S. Senators who pass legislation that calls on us to have limits on antisatellite weapons; for U.S. Senators who talk about peace; for U.S. Senators who believe that this Nation takes daring steps to end the arms race; for Senators who watched John Kennedy in 1963 take that kind of step, with the limited test ban as a consequence—for those Senators to say to the President, by voting tonight for this measure: "Mr. President, won't you please entertain the thought of holding off for 9 weeks in the interest of putting the Soviet Union on the defensive, in the interest of hopefully keeping us out of space"?

I believe that is a worthy goal, and I am sorry it has to be tied to the immigration bill, but that is the only vehicle present, and the time is short. I believe that, in the interest of peace, it is worth it.

I was in Geneva during the recess, and I had occasion to talk to delegates of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty Review Conference, from more than 125 nations. Universally, including our own allies, who may smile and say nice things publicly, behind the scenes they are concerned, desperately concerned, about this move we are about to make. They are desperately concerned that we may be on a course that may embroil them as a battleground, nuclear or otherwise, and that may make it impossible for them to give true meaning to something like the Nonproliferation Treaty.

So I ask my colleagues to consider and consider hard. I know that the Senator from Ohio is going to say that the Soviets have a system; they have had it for 17 years, and we do not have one. Mr. President, we had one. We were the first ones to do it.

We tested one and we decided it was not very good so we dismantled it—the Nike-Zeus—we dismantled it.

The Soviets began after we had started but they have not tested for 3 years. They have two launch pads from which they can currently put something up.

If anyone here were President of the United States and the Soviets shot one of our satellites from one of those two pads and you know you have 5 or 6 hours before they can shoot again, you know and I know that something is going to happen in the course of those 5 or 6 hours to either resolve that problem or to not have it happen again.

If it does happen again, Mr. President, if it does happen again after 6 hours I do not believe there is a person here who would not consider the obliteration of Tyuratum, and deny them the ability to do it one more time.

Mr. President, when we talk about the abilities of the Soviets to knock down all our satellites, that is not a realistic problem today, but if we test tomorrow and if we cannot take that extra step to be able to prevent it, it may be the realistic problem, and it will be because we have not had the courage and we have not had the gumption to stand up and say that 9 weeks is worth the effort for peace.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KERRY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. I strongly support this amendment and the Senator from Massachusetts' efforts in this regard, and I think it is absolutely sound policy for this Nation. I wonder if the Senator from Massachusetts would kindly respond to a question or two.

First, does he contemplate this amendment as a referendum on whether this country ought to have an antisatellite capability?

Mr. KERRY. No; I do not contemplate this amendment as that. I contemplate it as a referendum on the issue of whether or not we should take a step now, under the existing situation, to try to prevent the need to have an antisatellite ability by limiting both nations' development of this technology.

Mr. HART. So, really the essence of this amendment at the present time is one of timing and the question really has to do with when a step ought to be taken, rather than whether it ought to be taken.

Mr. KERRY. The distinguished Senator from Colorado is absolutely correct.

Mr. HART. So the Senator from Massachusetts really intends to test the good faith of the Soviet Union and test the bargaining and negotiating process. This process has been the mainstream, bipartisan policy of this Nation since the 1960's that is, bilateral negotiations between the superpowers to seek limits and controls and on the spread of both offensive and defensive systems. Is that not correct?

Mr. KERRY. I would only change one word there which is to perhaps say whatever faith the Soviet Union would characterize good or not, whatever faith, and otherwise I absolutely agree.

Mr. HART. Does the Senator from Massachusetts believe that this country's security would be jeopardized by waiting until after the summit meeting to go forward with this test?

Mr. KERRY. This Senator, based on 4 years' experience in the military and serving at the nuclear-chemical-biological warfare school and whatever other attributes I can bring to the judgment, does not in any way feel that 9 weeks will jeopardize the security of the United States. It will enhance it.

Mr. HART. Finally, if I may ask the Senator, somewhat apart from the major intent of this amendment, if in fact the sole condition under which arms control can operate is verification—the national technical means of both nations to be able to detect whether the other nation is living up to the terms of an agreement. Can the Senator from Massachusetts suggest what possible reason there might be for this Nation to have an ability to blind or obliterate the Soviet Union's capability of verifying treaties that we might negotiate?

Mr. KERRY. I think there are a number. One obviously is our ability for star wars, our ability to put in a space-based defensive system regardless of what happens to the ABM treaty, and a second obviously is the belief in terms of policy that we are better off always achieving a technological superiority and holding on to those windows of superiorities rather than ever trying to achieve stability or parity and essential equivalency.

Mr. HART. The question I am trying to get at here is what possible security purpose would be served by pursuing a race to be able to deny one side or the other the ability to verify limits on treaties that might be negotiated?

Mr. KERRY. None that I can see.

Mr. HART. If I may say so, I think the Senator from Massachusetts is to be congratulated for calling this matter to the attention of the American people. I am afraid it is one of those situations where decisions have been made, tests will go forward; it will be one fairly important step away from the ability to reach an agreement at the summit, an agreement at Geneva and may pose, as the Senator from Massachusetts has already suggested, an irretrievable step.

I hope people will not merely approach this issue on a technological basis; that is, how capable is the Soviet system and how capable is ours? That is not the issue.

The issue is not even one of parity: they have an antisatellite capability, therefore, we have to have one.

The issue is a far deeper policy question and that is: what possible national security purpose can the ability to blind Soviet satellites have, except in the case where we are prepared to go to war?

I thank the Senator.

Mr. KERRY. I thank the distinguished Senator for his questions which point to the heart of the matter. I think the Senator from Colorado underscores clearly and very succinctly perhaps the bottom line, if you will, and I thank him for his question in doing so.

Mr. President, I reserve whatever time may remain. I inquire how much that is at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opponents have 20 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. And the proponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents have 25.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Twenty-five.

I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Ohio and if he needs more just ask for it.

Mr. GLENN. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. President, we all agree we would like to have a total and complete verifiable ban on antisatellite weapons.

If past history is any indication of our arms negotiating capacity at Geneva, however, that agreement is unlikely in the foreseeable future.

Therefore, I believe it is in the best interest of our national security for us to proceed with the testing of our own antisatellite system.

I would say in starting out, Mr. President, I dislike the position I am in very much, that of opposing the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. Few in this body or in the House of Representatives have a more distinguished combat record, or have sacrificed more for this country, and feel more strongly about the need to control future warfare than Senator KERRY. And I feel much the same way. I have had a lot of combat, too, but I did not suffer as much as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I know he is the recipient of I believe three separate Purple Hearts, and he has a very distinguished combat record.

The Senator has pointed out, Mr. President, the fact that we have stayed ahead in technology. He enumerated numerous instances where we have gone ahead, and where we have developed new weapons systems and the Soviets have followed behind.

I can only say that I am very thankful for that, and that it is not the other way around. If the Soviets had been ahead and we were the ones lagging along behind, history might not show that deterrence has worked as well as it has with us in the lead, as it would have with the Soviets in the lead.

Granted, our ASAT system, if it works, as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said, if it works, will be a superior system. But that "if it works" is what we are trying to find out with the test tomorrow.

Recent intelligence briefings, the latest of which was just yesterday, which some of us including the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts attended, showed the Soviets have been moving ahead with their Asat capabilities on several different fronts.

Now, what is our vulnerability to the Soviet antisatellite capability? The distinguished Senator from Colorado made the point that we are dependent on our national technical means for verifying everything the Soviets do, and they are dependent on the same thing against us. But they have the advantage of a subscription to Aviation Week and to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. So they have 98 percent of their job done for them. We do not have that.

What is at risk are our low-altitude satellites which give us the most detailed view of the Earth. These satellites can detect weaker electronic signals than we can from far out in space, they do our best photographic work, and they do ocean surveillance. These are the satellites that the distinguished Senator from Colorado referred to, and these are the satellites at risk with the Soviet system.

The very heart of our intelligence system is at risk when the Soviets have their antisatellite systems deployed.

What have the Soviets done or what are they doing in research? They cover at least four major areas of Asat technology.

The one antisatellite system they have deployed right now is the coorbital interceptor.

I will not try to explain this system in detail, but it is a launch vehicle that gets on the same orbital plane as the vehicle which it intends to attack, slowly overtakes it, and then destroys it.

A second system which they have is a direct-ascent interceptor, which in theory is similar to the miniature homing vehicle that we are trying to develop.

The Galosh, which the Senator from Massachusetts referred to, can be a direct-ascent interceptor. We do not know quite what it can do, but the best estimates are it may have a capability against our satellites.

Third, they are also developing directed energy weapons, such as lasers and particle beam weapons. These are not in place yet, but they are working on them. They would endanger our satellites.

Fourth, they are working on electronic countermeasures of sufficient power to damage or interrupt satellite functions.

So there are four major areas that they are working on now: coorbital interceptors, direct ascent interceptors, direct energy weapons, and electronic countermeasures.

What has gained the most attention is the coorbital interceptor. They have had it deployed since 1968, and they have conducted 20 tests of their coorbital Asat system.

The best estimates are exactly what the Senator from Massachusetts said, that only nine of these tests have been successful. Senator KERRY points with great pride to the fact that the Soviets have only been 45 percent successful.

But I submit, Mr. President, that is 45 percent more capability than we have in the United States of America. We have zero, because we dismantled our comparatively primitive system in the mid-1970's.

So to run a critique of the system of the Soviets and to point out its inadequacies when we do not even have a system to compare it with—we are zero; we are zero in our capability—leads me to believe that we should not postpone the scheduled test any longer, even for 8, 10, or 11 weeks.

The last test of their interceptor, it is true, was held in 1982, but that was the 20th test. We have conducted exactly one against a hole in space and our test vehicle did not have the homing device on board.

So they tested their orbital interceptor the last time in 1982. I guess perhaps we could read that a different way than was interpreted by the Senator from Massachusetts. I could interpret that to mean they are quite happy with their program and feel it is worthy of being deployed without any more tests. That may or may not be the case, obviously, I cannot speak for them.

The Soviet's coorbital interceptor has the ability to threaten all of our military intelligence satellites in low Earth orbit. Let us not confuse these satellites in low Earth orbit with the communications satellites in geosyncronous orbit. The satellites we would depend on the most for our national technical means—the low orbit satellites—are the very satellites that they would be able to take out most readily.

Now, whether they could do this within 24 hours, or a week, or even 2 weeks is not what is at issue here. The issue is that they have the capability to do this and, we have no capability to do it.

The other Soviet antisatellite research—on directed energy weapons, direct-ascent interceptors, and electronic countermeasures—put our satellites in higher orbits at some risk. However, we do not give them a whole lot of capability against our geosyncronous satellites at this time.

As I stated earlier, we have conducted one test of our antisatellite system in January 1984, and that was directed at a point in space, not at the target, and the miniature homing device was not even on board. So to assume that the Asat system we are currently developing is more flexible and effective than the current Soviet system may be a bit premature, because we have not even put our system to a real test yet, and that is really what we are talking about. There is no question the Soviets are interested in a moratorium because it would ensure them a unilateral advantage in Asat capabilities.

The Soviet squeals about how we should not upset this balance when there is no balance—all the balance is at their end of the scales—as far as I am concerned, should fall on deaf ears.

I think we would be much better off to look at the upcoming summit as an opportunity to negotiate with the Soviets, not by our own weakness or by our lack of testing, but by saying, "OK, we will go ahead and show we can hit an incoming satellite," and then by saying, "OK, you have a system and we have a system. Let us negotiate and both take our systems out of existence."

And we can do it from a position of strength at that time, of proven capability, not by going and saying we have forsworn testing against your system when we do not even have a capability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Preisdent, will the Senator yield me 3 more minutes?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. I thank the Senator.

That, to me, would be a much more realistic negotiating position on which to go to Geneva. The Soviets must indeed laugh when they think they can force postponement of a system of ours that is a response to a system that they have had in place for some 17 years.

It would be just as ludicrous if we thought we could say to the Soviets,

> We have had aircraft carriers with a tremendous power projection capability for many, many years. Now, Soviet Union, you should not develop this weapon system. You should not develop aircraft carriers. You should not develop that kind of force projection because you have never had it before. It is going to upset a balance that previously was all on the side of the United States.

I am sure the Soviets would think that was preposterous.

A couple of years ago, I proposed that we not deploy our GLCM's ground launched cruise missiles, for a period of time because the Soviets had not deployed theirs. I thought that once we crossed that threshold, there would be a great deal of difficulty in verifying any future arms control negotiations. So I asked the deployment be put off for 90 days so we could make one last attempt at negotiating with the Soviets.

But this is a different situation. This is a situation where the Soviets have an existing system. It is in place. We can question its capability, but even with the estimates of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts of it being only 45 percent successful, that is 45 percent more capability than we have in this country. I think we can go to Geneva with a stronger position if we go with a system that has had at least one successful test. Hopefully, then, we can say, "We have a system and you have a system. Let's negotiate.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, if I may, I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Ohio a question or two. What I would like to do, if I may, Mr. President, is talk about where we are today.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator indicated that this time would come off his time.

Mr. KERRY. Yes; I did indicate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is using time under his control.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, as we are here tonight on the eve of this test, it is true, is it not, that the current Soviet capability to knock down satellites is from the Tyuratum site and its current co-orbital system? That is today's ability—correct?

Mr. GLENN. Although we are getting into an intelligence area, I believe there is another site which they can launch from, but the majority of their capability is from the Tyuratum site.

Mr. KERRY. What the Senator is talking about with respect to direct energy, laser capability, direct descent capability, we are also working on—correct?

Mr. GLENN. We are, indeed.

Mr. KERRY. And with respect to today's decisionmaking, we must make a determination of current threat to the United States as it exists today. My question to the Senator is: If we are working on those systems as they are, if the only existing system is Tyuratum, and perhaps another site where the same kind of system could be launched, then the only threat to our satellites today is a system where you could have two shots, maybe three, and an interval of 4 to 6 hours; is that correct?

Mr. GLENN. When you speak of reload time, I am not willing to confirm or not confirm the times, although it takes a definite period of time to reload.

Mr. KERRY. This is from unclassified published sources, Scientific American magazine, and other things, where this has been pretty thoroughly discussed. Of course, I am taking my information from there. Assuming that is the range, we will agree at least there is a delay period.

Mr. GLENN. There is, indeed.

Mr. KERRY. The delay period is a delay period of hours.

Mr. GLENN. That is correct.

Mr. KERRY. In reality in terms of our decisionmaking and response after one or two satellites have been hit, we get some time to do some thinking before responding, do we not?

Mr. GLENN. I presume after our satellite has been hit, we would be doing a lot of very fast thinking.

Mr. KERRY. Or responding?

Mr. GLENN. That is the question. Are we going to start World War III after they take out one satellite? Would it be two satellites? Do we take out Tyuratum? After one satellite, or would it require two Satellites being blasted out of space? Would it be three? That is a horrendous decision that the President of the United States would have to make, as to whether we obliterate a major city in the Soviet Union after we lose one satellite or two or whatever. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I would much rather have the ability to take out one of their satellites if they take out one of our satellites. We cannot do that right now without the test and without developing our own system. That would be a more logical response that would not lead automatically to World War III.

Mr. KERRY. In the long run, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio. I am not standing here making an argument that if we cannot get an agreement, if they continue to improve their system, we should not build a satellite system. I am not somebody who believes that we should not have the strongest defense of any nation on the face of this planet. Of course we should. But the issue is today's threat. Why, if that is the threat, is there a clear and irrevocable harm to the United States national security by not testing 9 weeks later? This very same threat that the Senator has just described in answer to my question has existed for 15 years. Why is there an irrevocable national security threat in 9 weeks?

Mr. GLENN. I agree completely with the Senator from Massachusetts. To put this off for 9 weeks is not going to do irrevocable damage. However, I think it indicates to the Soviets that every time they squeal about something we are willing to jump through hoops, and give more credibility to their squeals than I think is necessary. We put off for 17 years not developing our capability. Is 9 weeks more going to hurt us? No, probably not. But I want to see us get on with it. We need this capability. If we are going to reduce the risk of World War III by us not having to take our Tyuratum when they take out one or two of our satellites, I would much rather that we have the capability of taking out one or two of their satellites. Then maybe we can negotiate.

Mr. KERRY. I appreciate the Senator's comments. My only problem is if I were sitting in the Soviet Union making decisions and I must make a judgment about building or not building or trying to put the genie back in the bottle on a missile that fits under the wing of an F-15 that has a homing ability versus my coorbital ability, I would be worried, and it would be darned hard for me as a leader in that country to say to my people that I feel any more secure or more especially that I am in a position to negotiate from strength. I do not know a nation in the world that negotiates out of weakness. I do not want to and I do not think you can. But if we test this successfully and put them in the position of weakness, they then, just as we have throughout the arms race, will wait until they build the same system before they negotiate.

Mr. GLENN. How does the Senator feel he puts them in the position of weakness?

Mr. KERRY. We have been though the history of bargaining chips here ad infinitum. We know the history. Here we are with one more bargaining chip theory 9 weeks before summit with no increase in threat to the United States. The Senator said it himself. There is no difference in 9 weeks. The Senator also said it is not irrevocable harm. If it is not irrevocable harm, then the certification given us by the President of the United States is false.

Mr. GLENN. I am not here to verify what the President of the United States said. I have some doubts about some of that verification myself and about how hard they negotiated in Geneva. He certified they did. I am not here to really argue with him about it. But I think when we go to Geneva, we would be in a far better negotiating position if we had a successful satellite test under our belt to compare with their system, and then we can really negotiate from a position of equality, or at least partial equality. We will not have a deployed system, but we will have at least one test that shows proof of intent, which we do not have right now. It might fail.

Mr. KERRY. It may well fail, as the distinguished Senator says. I just cannot for the life of me understand why the President—I cannot say, "Mr. Gorbachev, I am willing to hold off 9 weeks, and if we do not get an agreement in Geneva, or you are not serious about talking, I am going to test the thing, and I am going to have Senator KERRY and others voting for it because you have it." It is not a huge loss.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry: How much time does the proponent have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The proponent has 17 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the proponent has 17 minutes left, how about the opponent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will yield 3 minutes to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum for the Secretary of Defense and the certification be printed in the RECORD at this point in the debate.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION No. 85-19

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Pursuant to Section 205 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985, as enacted by P.L. 98-525, I hereby determine and certify that:

The United States is endeavoring in good faith to negotiate with the Soviet Union a mutual and verifiable agreement with the strictest possible limitations on anti-satellite weapons consistent with the national security interests of the United States.

Pending agreement on such strict limitations, testing against objects in space of the F-15 launched miniature homing vehicle anti-satellite warhead by the United States is necessary to avert clear and irrevocable harm to the national security.

Such testing would not constitute an irreversible step that would gravely impair prospects for negotiations on anti-satellite weapons.

Such testing is fully consistent with the rights and obligations of the U.S. under the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 as those rights and obligations exist at the time of such testing.

You are directed on my behalf to report this determination and certification to the Congress.

You or your delegatee are authorized and directed to publish this determination and certification in the Federal Register.

RONALD REAGAN.

MV ASAT TESTING CERTIFICATION

On March 31, 1984, I submitted a Report to the Congress, in classified and unclassified forms, which detailed many of the considerations involved in analyzing possible limitations on anti-satellite weapons. As that report notes, any realistic and balanced consideration of this topic must take into account a number of problems. These problems include: the need for effective verification; the potential for breakout; the risks of disclosing sensitive information; the problems of definition of space weapons; the vulnerability of satellite support systems; and Soviet military space activity. In particular, it should be noted that definitional and monitoring difficulties plus the need to counter such satellites as the space-based, targeting elements of Soviet weapons systems contribute to the conclusion that a comprehensive ban that would seek to eliminate development, testing, deployment, and use of all means of countering satellites is not verifiable and not in our national security interest. Moreover, no arrangements or agreements beyond those already governing military activities in outer space have been found to date that are judged to be in the overall interest of the United States and its Allies and that meet the congressionally mandated requirements of verifiability and consistency with the national security.

The United States is presently involved in negotiations at Geneva on a whole range of nuclear and space issues. At these negotiations, Ambassador Kampelman is, among other things, seeking to explore with the Soviet Union the merits of a strategic relationship characterized by a greater reliance on defenses.

We have been unable, to date, to identify a specific ASAT proposal which meets the requirements identified by the Congress in 1984. We are seriously exploring with the U.S.S.R. arms control arrangements intended to prevent an arms race in space while—we hope—easing a possible transition to a more reliable and effective deterrent posture for both sides. We will continue to study possible ASAT limitations in good faith to see whether such limitations are consistent with the national security interests of the United States. We are, therefore, acting in conformity with the first certification requirement.

The primary purposes of a United States ASAT capability are to deter threats to space systems of the United States and its Allies and, within such limits imposed by international law, to deny any adversary advantages arising from the offensive use of space-based systems which could undermine deterrence.

The USSR has the world's only operational ASAT system with an effective capability to seek and destroy critical U.S. space systems in near-earth orbit. In 1982, a test of this system was integrated into an exercise of Soviet strategic offensive and defensive forces. Moreover, the U.S.S.R. maintains a very large directed energy research program, including ground based lasers assessed to be capable of performing some ASAT functions. This program could also result in the launch of the first prototype of a space-based laser ASAT in the late 1980's or very early 1990's. In addition, since space systems are vulnerable to a broad range of threats from direct attack to electronic warfare to nuclear effects, the Soviet Union could have developed—without our knowledge—a variety of other means to attack our satellites.

There is also a growing threat posed by present and prospective Soviet satellites which, while not weapons themselves, are designed to support directly the U.S.S.R.'s terrestrial forces in the event of conflict. These include ocean reconnaissance satellites which use radar and electronic intelligence in efforts to provide targeting data for use in attacking U.S. and allied surface fleets. They also include photographic and electronic intelligence satellites which provide targeting data and other information useful in supporting Soviet land forces. These Soviet space assets constitute a clear threat to our national security and that of our allies.

The United States must take the steps necessary to avert a situation in which the Soviet Union has full freedom to conduct effective attacks on our space systems knowing that their space objects, including those that provide targeting data, are not vulnerable to U.S. attack. The resultant instability from this asymmetry creates a risk of irrevocable harm to the United States. U.S. development of a credible anti-satellite system is a necessary, integral part of the steps needed to avert this situation. Therefore, testing of the MV against objects in space by the United States is necessary to avert clear and irrevocable harm to the national security of the United States and its allies.

The ASAT testing which we intend to undertake follows by twelve years the initiation by the U.S.S.R. of its testing of a coorbital ASAT system which has for some time been the world's only operational ASAT system. The Soviets, moreover, as noted above, have tested and, in some cases deployed, systems which have inherent ASAT capabilities. The existence of such Soviet capabilities and their testing effectively preclude the possibility that testing by the United States of its MV ASAT will constitute an irreversible step.

In addition, we believe that testing can constitute an incentive to the Soviet Union to reach agreements on a wide range of issues and thus would not impair prospects for a successful conclusion to the negotiations now underway.

The testing against objects in space of the U.S. F-15 MV ASAT system will not give the system the capability to counter strategic ballistic missiles or their elements in flight trajectory and will not constitute a test in an ABM mode. Therefore, such testing is not prohibited by the ABM Treaty.

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am looking here at the RECORD of the previous actions by this body on this question. On the amendment which I sponsored earlier, the vote was 74 to 9 in favor of the amendment. Subsequently, the Senate approved the Armed Services recommendation with respect to the conference on the authorization bill by 94 to 5. Those actions were taken at a time when we had full knowledge of the summit that was upcoming. Therefore, I ask my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts what has occurred in the interim that would justify the Senate of the United States, in view of those strong votes, to perform a complete reversal which would be regarded throughout the world as one of the greatest flip-flops in history? I suggest at this critical time when our President is preparing for the summit that the Congress in every respect should provide support such that this Nation is speaking with one voice. I think it would be extremely detrimental to the summit preparations if at this time the Senate—I am confident it will not do so—were to provide a flip-flop in the record of the vote on this issue.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I would like to answer that. I would also like to yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am not sure I understand what the Senator from Virginia was trying to say. If he was suggesting that the vote on the conference report of the Defense Authorization bill was some sort of ratification for an antisatellite testing program, then I certainly do not understand that assertion. I am sure, on reflection, he would not want that to stand.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator will yield on my time——

Mr. HART. No. I am answering the Senator's question. To suggest this argument stressing that this Chamber should speak with one voice seems to me to fly in the face of the Jeffersonian notion about this Nation that people can have honest disagreements. If we are being told now that nobody can disagree with the President on anything having to do with defense or foreign policy because we are headed for a summit, then I do apparently not understand what the American system is all about. Certainly, with an issue having to do with nuclear arms or the one voice theory that we keep hearing about applied to policy for South Africa suggests that Senators of the United States cannot stand up and disagree with respect to discussion of an antisatellite test being conducted on what I believe is a phony certification, I certainly believe the Senator from Virginia might want to rethink his assertion.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to reply on my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I respect the distinguished Senator from Colorado. The authorizing conferees adopted a compromise position that permits a total of three Asat tests against an object in space through the end of fiscal year 1986. The conference report on the authorization bill was adopted in the Senate by a vote of 94-5.

Mr. HART. So 94 Senators would say go ahead, that was what they were voting for? I certainly do not believe they voted for that. I do not think many Senators looked at the line items in that bill and approved every one of them.

Mr. President, what we are addressing is a qualitative escalation of the arms race. There is one reason to have observation satellites—to verify what the other side is doing. It is because of our mutual capabilities to verify what the other side is doing that we have had any arms control at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KERRY. I yield such time as the Senator requires.

Mr. HART. I think the issue is a policy question, Mr. President, not a technological question. Do we want to get into a race that invalidates the ability to verify arms control agreements? That is the issue. Do we want to do it 9 weeks before we have a summit conference, ostensibly to help limit the nuclear arms race?

Well, I guess you can have the bargaining chip theory that unless we develop an Asat, we do not have anything to bargain with.

I do not happen to believe that.

I think this is a very serious question. This is not just another weapons system. This is a qualitative escalation of the nuclear arms race. Mr. President, if we get into the business of insisting everything the Soviets have, we have to have too, or that there should be no delay in going forward with a test whose timing was arbitrarily set in the first place, or if we believe genuinely we have been doing serious bargaining in Geneva to limit antisatellite weapons, then we believe in the tooth fairy.

This is not a vote on giving the President a mandate or whether we have strength or weakness or any other rhetoric that gets thrown around on the floor to obscure serious questions. This is whether the timing is right to go forward with a major step in the escalation in the arms race in a way we have never done before, which threatened the very ability to negotiate meaningful arms control.

I hope the Senate will sober up and throw the rhetoric aside and address the basic fundamental policy question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I would like to briefly answer the question of the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

I voted among those 94 for a lot of different reasons, not the least of which there was a lot of good in it that we need. I also led the fight prior to that as an amendment to that report to try to prevent the satellite testing for a period of time, as the Senator knows. I gladly cosponsored with him the language which he just read, which I voted for in the final report.

I do not think it changes, as the Senator said, our ability to want still to create conditions whereby limitations on Asat's can be achieved.

Second, and perhaps more importantly, the distinguished Senator from Virginia and the 93 others all voted for a particular process, which is a matter of law today, which codified our intent that the President should adhere to the process.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio has already cast doubt on that process.

That is what is different. That is what has changed to say we should be here now debating this issue because the certification is not bona fide. There is not serious negotiation about Asat restrictions going on in Geneva nor has there been. We are not pursuing that policy.

Finally and just as importantly, at the time we took that vote, I do not believe the summit had been announced. This is a new opportunity. It is a new window. I think we ought to seize it, as the distinguished Senator from Colorado said.

It is an issue of policy. It really is an issue of policy. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do so as one who is not opposed in principle to a limited U.S. Asat testing program so long as it is undertaken as part of a serious effort to reach a verifiable agreement to constrain testing and deployment of Asat weapons.

A limited test program of our Asat system would not be enough for us to have confidence in the deployment of our Asat. So a limit on further testing and on deployment of our Asat would still be verifiable.

A moratorium on testing of our Asat so long as the Soviets do not test an Asat poses the problem that the Soviets would have little incentive to negotiate seriously on the details of an agreement in that circumstance. For they would have already accomplished their objective of stopping our Asat program before they sat down at the negotiating table.

So I have supported the three-test Asat testing compromise which has emerged from the Defense Authorization Conference the past 2 years, provided the President certified our intention to seek the strictest possible verifiable Asat limits before starting the limited test program. But I have not supported testing of our Asat without any serious attempt at negotiating restraints on these systems. For then we would be forgoing an opportunity to reduce the vulnerability of our critical command, control, communications, and intelligence satellites in return for a transitory advantage in placing similar Soviet satellites at risk. Without any Asat limits, we would be guaranteed a future in which essentially all space systems on both sides would grow ever more vulnerable.

Unfortunately, the Presidential certification sent to the Congress on August 20 does not inspire confidence in the administration's intention seriously to pursue Asat limits. Far from it. And the certification was apparently originally sent up so that the 15-day waiting period would expire and an Asat test would take place prior to Congress' return from its August recess. In that case we would have faced a fait accompli. Luckily, someone in the Defense Department did not count properly, so we do have this opportunity today to debate the certification and the administration's approach prior to the first Asat test against an object in space. That test is, according to news reports, now scheduled for tomorrow.

Mr. President, I think that we have to ask ourselves, "Why the haste in conducting this test?" Why bother to do the test against an uninstrumented target, when presumably we want to get all the information we can from each test? Is not that a waste of money? Why rush to get the test in before the summit? If it is a failure, won't the President's hand actually be weakened? And just how troubled is this program technically? Apparently, the last test of our Asat against a point in space was not a success. Apparently, the Air Force keeps offering up this program for cancellation in the DOD's internal budget reviews, presumably an indication that they don't think that this will be the Asat system of choice in the long run.

In point of fact, if we and the Soviets reach a limited agreement in the future, banning our current Asat and the Soviets' current Asat, an extremely limited system which failed its last six tests before the Soviets declared their moratorium on further testing a couple of years ago, neither side may in fact be giving up much at all. Both sides will simply turn to the potentially far more effective Asat systems currently at the research stage, so long as testing and deployment of those systems remain unconstrained. So I hope we will do better than such a limited agreement on the current generation of Asat's if we and the Soviets ever seriously undertake negotiations in this area.

In summary, because I have concerns both about the administration's commitment to seeking Asat arms control constraints and about the haste with which this test has been put together, I am going to vote in favor of the Senator from Massachusetts' amendment. We need the time between now and the Geneva Summit to sort out our national policy on Asat arms control. I am not opposed in principle to our conducting some tests of our Asat system in the future provided it is done in the context of a serious attempt to negotiate Asat restraints and to deal with the growing problem of satellite vulnerability.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I support Senator KERRY's timely amendment urging the President to postpone further testing of U.S. antisatellite weapons until after the summit in Geneva. I support this amendment for at least two reasons.

First, if the United States were to announce that, as a gesture of our good faith, we were to postpone this test, it would establish an atmosphere that would be more conducive to achieving real progress in arms control at the summit this November. The announcement last month that the United States planned to conduct such a test before the summit gave the Soviets an important propaganda victory in the world and allowed them to portray the United States as not being sincere in our efforts to achieve meaningful arms control agreements with the Soviet Union.

And second, I believe that continued testing of antisatellite weapons by either side jeopardizes the possibility of achieving a verifiable ban on antisatellite weapons in a future agreement with the Soviet Union. The United States is much more dependent—both in our national security and in our civilian life—on satellites than is the Soviet Union, and we would thus stand to lose more if each nation were to develop and to deploy weapons with the capacity to destroy the other's satellites. The time to achieve a verifiable ban on antisatellite weapons which, in my opinion, would be in the national security interests of the United States, is now, before either nation has completed its efforts to develop more accurate and more sophisticated and more reliable methods of destroying objects in space. Without testing, these new weapons cannot be deployed with any confidence that they would work. And after testing, it will be much more difficult to verify any agreement between the two nations not to deploy such weapons.

So the first step down this path is to support Senator KERRY's amendment. The next step is for President Reagan to respond to our concerns and to order that the test be postponed. There is no risk to the fundamental interests of the United States if such an action were to be taken by the President, and there is potentially much to be gained.

I urge my fellow Senators to support the Kerry amendment.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending amendment to place a 9-week moratorium on the testing of antisatellite weapons [Asat] in space. This amendment should not be seen as a referendum on whether or not we should develop Asat technology. The question at hand is not even whether or not we should test Asat's in the future. The simple question is whether or not we should test our Asat technology now—tomorrow.

Tomorrow the Air Force intends to launch a new Asat weapon aimed, for the first time, at a space-based target. But everyone knows that the original test planned for tomorrow's launch has been scrapped. The Air Force originally planned to test the Asat against a multimillion dollar instrumental target satellite which was painstakingly designed over a number of years, to give the fullest possible data on the performance of the Asat. But the supersatellite is on the blink and the Air Force is now going to fire the Asat at an old, useless satellite. Obviously the test has been seriously degraded and will yield minimal data.

The Air Force has all but admitted that the only reason for prematurely conducting the test tomorrow is that the President wants to flex his military muscle before the meets with Mikhail Gorbachev at the summit in 9 weeks. In effect, the President wants to use the Asat test as a bargaining tool, which is exactly what he should not do at this time.

As we saw with MIRV's and with the cruise missiles, bargaining tools or chips that are allowed to proceed too far soon become building blocks.

Allowing this bogus test of our Nation's Asat technology to go ahead sends the wrong signal to the Soviets verily moments before a crucial summit between the superpowers' leaders. While we do not want to show weakness, we do want to show a pragmatic interest in reaching agreements about the weapons race in space.

I oppose the Asat test tomorrow and believe that its postponement until after the summit will enhance, not weaken, our Nation's negotiations.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has 15 minutes and the Senator from Massachusetts 11 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I will not take long. The arguments have been made, and I think they are very succinct, against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Colorado who participated in the conference report will remember that this was one of the most hotly contested arguments that we had. The House took a very strong position on a satellite and we had not taken such a strong position. Nevertheless, the decision was finally reached as related by the Senator from Virginia.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado, that we should discuss these things on the floor, even though the prerogative of foreign policy rests with the President, and even though attaching such an important amendment as this to an immigration bill I think is entirely, nongermane. But we will wait and see what happens to that.

Mr. President, I really believe the job of the U.S. Senate, the job of the Armed Services Committee, is to do our best to provide a strong United States. To me, that is paramount. I do not give a particular hoot about what the Russians think about what we do. The negotiations in Geneva, in my estimation, are going to be a total waste of time whether we conduct this test tomorrow, the next day, 9 weeks from now, or anytime. I think the attitude that prevails in the Soviet Union is the attitude that we should have in this country: That whatever we have to do to make this country strong enough to preserve our freedom we are going to do.

Here is s system of antisatellite that has been worked on for a long time. It was worked on for a long time and then abandoned. Now, tomorrow, an F-15 is going to take off and attempt to hit a target a little bit above the average target. We do not know if it is going to work. There is no way in the world for us to know it is going to work. If it does not work it becomes another ball game.

If it does work, then we have taken one more step in what we should be doing, providing for the strength of the United States and not forever worrying about what the head of the Soviet Union thinks about or what the Soviet military thinks about.

Personally, I do not think we are going to war, and I do not think that anything we are talking about here on the floor tonight is going to help prevent war.

Mr. President, I am going to move at the proper time to table this amendment. The vote will not come until Tuesday. I would hope that Members of the Senate would take advantage of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read it.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I believe the order reads that we will have a vote this evening on this matter on a motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no order presently to put a vote over until Tuesday.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, at this time I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I would like to summarize, if I may, for the proponents.

I listened to the very distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, whom I respect enormously and who I know has nothing but the interests of this country in mind. I would like to think that we share that. I certainly share with him the belief that what we should do is whatever is necessary to preserve the strength of the United States. As I said earlier, we should indeed be second in defense to no nation in the world. But it is my judgment we are that today and we will be that 9 weeks from now if we vote to delay this test. In fact, we may even be less strong should this test be successful. So I would hope that my colleagues will vote to exercise their constitutional and appropriate prerogative to advise the President with respect to international policy. It is certainly within our purview to decide what systems we think ought to be part of our arsenal and what are not.

Mr. President, I yield back my time and again express my appreciation to the manager of the bill and regret indeed that this had to happen on his bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, did the Senator yield back the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded back the remainder of his time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I move to table this amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 34, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment (No. 597) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, if I may have your attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Chamber please be in order so that the manager of the bill might be heard? Will those Senators conversing please take their conversations which would mean themselves also to the cloakroom?

We are not going to proceed until the Chamber is in order.

The Senator from Wyoming, and may we please have attention in the Chamber so the Senator from Wyoming might be heard as to further procedures for this evening.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment to make some remarks before I yield to the Senator from Florida.

We will very shortly take the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] and then an amendment of Senator MCCLURE which will be an up-and-down vote and then we will discontinue the activities for today and begin tomorrow at 9 a.m. with morning business. That is the intent in any event. Then we will be back on the bill as soon as that is concluded with Senator KENNEDY's amendment on legalization in midday, then the other amendments, and make every effort to, in fact, conclude the bill tomorrow. I am not aware of how many rollcall votes there might be. I would hope it will not be more than four. But in any event, I tell you that and it is not me pushing. The bill is the pending item of business.

Monday is a holiday from voting, and Tuesday we intend to go on toward Superfund and that activity.

So we would like to dispose of this, win, lose, or draw.

That is the information I can share with you at this time with regard to the bill.

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

AMENDMENT NO. 598

(Purpose: To authorize an immigration emergency revolving fund of $35,000,000 to be used to provide for an increase in border patrol or other enforcement activities of the Service, and for reimbursement of State and localities in providing assistance in meeting an immigrant emergency)

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] proposed an amendment numbered 598.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill add the following:

SEC. . There are authorized to be appropriated to an immigration emergency revolving fund, to be established in the Treasury, $35,000,000, to be used to provide for an increase in border patrol or other enforcement activities of the Service and for reimbursement of State and localities in providing assistance as requested by the Attorney General in meeting an immigration emergency, except that no amounts may be withdrawn from such funds with respect to an emergency unless the President has determined that the immigration emergency exists and has certified such fact to the Judiciary Committees of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, this amendment should be familiar to the managers of the bill. They have seen it before, the last time the Senate considered immigration reform legislation back in May 1983. At that time, the managers recognized the need for such an amendment and graciously agreed to accept it without objection. Since the language of the amendment is identical and since the situation is the same, I hope that we can reach an similar accommodation on this go-round of the immigration bill.

The purpose of the amendment is to establish a $35 million contingency fund to be available in the event of a immigration emergency, such as Florida experienced in 1980.

The Mariel immigration emergency was a management disaster. The Federal Government could not makeup its mind whether it wanted to welcome the Marielitos with open arms, or whether it wanted to prevent Castro's illegal display. This wavering was reflected in the bureaucracy by chaos and confusion. As if the sheer magnitude of helping 120,000 people arrive and be assimilated into American society in a period of months were not grave enough, these problems were compounded by ambiguity over which Federal agencies has what powers to act, and a reluctance in some agencies to reprogram previously allocated funds for this new and expected contingency.

While we did it the hard way, we have gained some valuable experience from the Cuban boatlift. Over the last couple of years the administration has been developing a contingency plan to deal with immigration emergencies. That plan was completed several years ago. It outlines the options and authorities of those agencies called on in event of an immigration emergency. Although the plan draws on the experience of the 1980 boatlift, it has been drafted so that it applies to any other kind of an immigration emergency. I have had an opportunity to review this plan, and while I believe that the President needs additional authority to handle such emergencies, the current plan will greatly enhance the ability of the Federal Government to respond to such situations in a timely and effect manner.

While I would prefer to prevent such emergencies in the future, this kind of a plan is a good idea—just in case. However, implementing it requires immediate access to funds. During the Cuban boatlift in 1980, the lack of adequate funding at the critical outset of the emergency compounded the problems created by the boatlift. Local agencies were reluctant to use their funds for any unforseen contingency fearing they had no right to do so or would not be reimbursed.

My amendment addresses the problem of funding. It sets up a fund of $35 million that can be drawn on in the event that the President declares an immigration emergency. It does not expand the President's powers to deal with such an emergency. It provides him with the financial resources to employ his existing authorities effectively and promptly. The lack of funding for the immigration emergency contingency plan is its fundamental deficiency, and until the problem of adequate funding is solved the plan amounts to little more than a hollow, time-consuming exercise.

Finally there is one additional important point regarding my amendment—it will have no effect on the size of the Federal deficit. Because the use of this fund is contingent upon a Presidentially declared immigration emergency, it does not add one penny to budget outlays. As a result, there will be no effect on the budget deficit or the credit markets.

The fact that this amendment does not cost any money does not minimize its importance. This type of a contingency fund would be a vital tool in responding to any future immigration emergency—it will cut down on the confusion, chaos, and reluctance to act that characterized the 1980 Mariel Boatlift.

Mr. President, my amendment provides a reasonable and rational precaution against the kind of chaos that followed the Cuban boatlift—or that might follow any other immigration emergency.

This amendment is fair, and it is good policy. I urge my colleagues to give it their full support.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, in the 98th Congress, Senator HAWKINS, the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, and I agreed to this amendment. A similar version was approved by the conference committee. It simply provides, in the event of another Mariel Harbor-type emergency, that moneys will be available from an immigration emergency revolving fund to offset State and local costs to allow for an increase in enforcement activities.

I think it is true to state that it should have no impact on the budget issues, because the fund is contingent upon a Presidentially declared immigration emergency. Under this amendment, assistance will be provided when it is requested by the Attorney General after the emergency has been declared. That is my understanding.

Mrs. HAWKINS. That is correct.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment. On behalf of the ranking minority member and comanager of the bill, we will accept the amendment.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I thank the Senator and the ranking minority member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS].

The amendment (No. 598) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 599

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress that the English language is the official language of the United States)

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE] on behalf of himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. GARN, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. SYMMS, proposes an amendment numbered 599.

On page 125, after line 23, add the following:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. POLICY TOWARD THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States has been and will continue to be enriched by the contributions of immigrants from diverse cultures;

(2) a common language, English, fosters harmony among our people, promotes political stability, permits the interchange of ideas, encourages societal accord, and unites us as a people committed to freedom and equality;

(3) the learning of the English language by our Nation's immigrants is vital to their participation in the economic, education, social, and political opportunities of our country; and

(4) a role of the Congress is supporting the bonds that unite our people, one of the most important of which is the use of the English language.

(b) POLICY. —It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the English language is the official language of the United States; and

(2) no language other than the English language is recognized as the official language of the United States.

On page 3, at the end of the table of contents, add the following:

SEC. 601. Policy toward the English language.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today I am offering an amendment to the immigration bill which expresses the sense of the Senate that English is the official language of the United States. I emphasize that it is a sense-of-the-Senate finding and statement of policy. It does not amend statutes. It does not have the effect of changing any of the laws of the land with respect to any other law that affects this issue.

Diversity and tolerance have always made this country great. As a nation of immigrants, we have had to forge our common commitment to freedom from many backgrounds, philosophies and ideals. The very fact that people from all countries and all walks of life have come to America and worked together for common goals is a testament of our strength.

But, Mr. President, while diversity has helped to make us strong, we must not lose sight of our common bonds. Every nation must have those practices which are shared by all citizens. I believe a common language is one of those practices.

For non-English-speaking immigrants, the learning of the English language is the first task to be mastered. This has been true for the last 200 years. I believe we do a grave disservice to immigrants if we allow them to believe they can fully participate in the many opportunities this country offers if they do not learn English. This simply is not true. If a person does not have a working knowledge of English, he cannot fill out a job application, cannot participate in community affairs, cannot be a good consumer. Not only is the immigrant himself shut out of our society, we as a nation suffer the loss of his contributions. If diversity has made us strong, we must have a means of communication to share that diversity. If I were to move to France tomorrow, how could I possibly expect to be a productive member of that nation if I were to continue speaking only English?

Mr. President, the purpose of this resolution is not to discourage, in any way, the ethnic and linguistic differences in this country. I support and encourage the rights of all Americans to preserve their cultural heritages. It is vitally important that we preserve our ability to welcome all people from all nations and learn from them. But I believe this is an entirely different issue from the preservation and promotion of English. Maintaining different cultural ties and traditions does not preclude the necessity to read, write, and speak English.

Our former colleague, Senator S.I. Hayakawa, has been widely quoted on this matter but I think his statements bear repeating. Senator Hayakawa said:

Language is a powerful tool. A common language can unify; separate languages can fracture and fragment a society. The American "melting pot" has succeeded in creating a vibrant new culture among people of many different cultural backgrounds largely because of the widespread use of a common language, English. Learning English has been the primary task of every immigrant group for two centuries. Participation in the common language has rapidly made available to each new group the political and economic benefits of American society. Those who have mastered English have overcome the major hurdle to full participation in our democracy.

Mr. President, similar language to this amendment has passed the Senate on two occasions, most recently on last year's immigration bill. I urge my colleagues to support my amendment.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from Idaho. There are 14 sponsors in the Senate on the English language amendment who have been working hard to see the English language become the official language of the United States. We in this body were preceded in this effort by our two former distinguished colleagues, Senator Huddleston and Senator Hayakawa, who started paving the way for this in this country.

According to the law, Mr. President, a person must be able to read and write and speak English to become a citizen. Proficiency in English is required in order to participate in the American dream, to enjoy the full economic opportunities this Nation offers, and to enter into the political dialog which is not possible in many nations on Earth. In order to do all of this in America, a person must be able to use the English language.

We are in favor of preserving one's ethnic background when we stand to say we still want the common bond of English. We do not desire to destroy anyone's pride in their heritage. On the contrary. We encourage the learning of foreign languages and the preservation of cultural heritage. In fact, just this morning I had the distinct privilege in the Russell Building to see an award given to Jimmy Jausoro and his famous Orinkari dance troupe from Boise, ID. They were here and honored with a major national award in the arts. This is a cultural group, the Basques in Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Utah, the western States, and northern California. It is a very large group. They are very large in our State. They are a very important part of the fiber of heritage in our State. It is interesting that one of the leaders of that group is the secretary of state of the State of Idaho, Pete Cenarussa, who, when he started in the public school system in Idaho, he could not speak a word of English. Neither could his parents. He was instructed by his parents to go to school, learn English, come home, and teach the family English so they could survive. He later served with distinction in World War II as a pilot in the armed services in the U.S. Marine Corps, graduated from the University of Idaho, and served as speaker of the house of representatives in the State of Idaho. He always has said had it not been for the persistence of his parents to force him to learn English, he would never have been able to be the success he has become.

Mr. President, I am very proud of the Basques in Idaho, proud of the group that got the honor today, and proud of them for being great Americans. They all emphasize the importance of having their youngsters be able to come in and learn to participate in the English language so they can enjoy our society.

I compliment and thank my distinguished senior collegue for offering this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to ask unanimous-consent to be named a cosponsor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. My remarks will be very brief. In my home State of South Dakota—I think throughout this Nation—the common ladder to economic success has been the English language. Increasingly, efforts are underway to offer our young people bilingual education. These efforts are to be commended. However, we must not lose sight of our official language. One sure way to lock our young people into poverty situations is to neglect their need to learn the English language. Some States have amended their constitutions to provide English as the official language. We in the U.S. Congress must also stress the importance of the English language.

I strongly support this amendment. I think it is a very thoughtful one. I have cosponsored similar amendments to immigration reform bills. I think that is a very essential provision and ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I have been discussing this amendment with several Senators on the floor, and one suggestion has been made that might aid its passage. First of all, Mr.

President, I appreciate the comments that have been made. I recognize the difficulty of raising this issue. But I think it is an important issue. I hope that the Senate will speak on it. I hope for a nearly unanimous vote, although I know it will not be unanimous. But in an effort to reduce any controversy, it has been suggested that a change in the language in the amendment would assist its passage. Therefore, I ask to modify the amendment. In subsection (b) on the second page, which is the policy statement, to amend it to read as follows: "It is the sense of the Congress that the English language is the official language of the United States." period, deleting the balance of subparagraph (b).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Chair.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 125, after line 23, add the following:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. POLICY TOWARD THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States has been and will continue to be enriched by the contributions of immigrants from diverse cultures;

(2) a common language, English, fosters harmony among our people, promotes political stability, permits the interchange of ideas, encourages societal accord, and unites us as a people committed to freedom and equality;

(3) the learning of the English language by our Nation's immigrants is vital to their participation in the economic, education, social, and political opportunities of our country; and

(4) a role of the Congress is supporting the bonds that unite our people, one of the most important of which is the use of the English language.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the English language is the official language of the United States.

SEC. 601. Policy toward the English language.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, let me make just this additional statement. The language I deleted refers to all other languages which I think is not an operative requirement of this amendment. But I would not want it to be read, that because we took that language out, we in any way wished to state the opposite, and that some other language is recognized as an official language.

I think it very clearly says on the face of it that the official language of the United States is the English language, and let us stand at that.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment that declares the sense of the Congress that the English language is the official language of the United States and that no other language other than the English language is recognized as the official language of the United States.

This amendment was passed by a 3-to-1 margin when it was offered to the immigration bill in the 97th Congress. It was also included in the immigration measure that passed the Senate in the last Congress.

Language is indeed a unifying factor. It is a characteristic of a people that brings divergent interests and backgrounds into a whole. It is the basis of a society and creates a public culture.

We who live in this great Nation have greatly benefited from the sharing of the ideas and the melding of the customs of all of the immigrants who have come to our shores. This enrichment is made even greater from the sharing of a common basis: The use of the English language.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this resolution.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from Idaho. I and the 14 cosponsors of S. 20, the English language amendment, have been working very hard to see English become the official language of the United States. We are preceded in this effort by our distinguished former colleagues, Senator Huddleston and Senator Sam Hayakawa.

Mr. President, according to the law, a person must be able to "read, write and speak English in ordinary usage" to become a citizen. In order to really participate in the American dream, to enjoy the full economic bounty this Nation offers and to enter into the political dialog which is not possible in many nations on Earth. In order to do all this in America, a person must use the English language.

We are in favor of preserving one's ethnic background. We do not desire to destroy one's pride in one's heritage. On the contrary, we encourage the learning of foreign languages and the preservation of cultural heritage. In fact, just this morning one of Idaho's best known Basques, Jimmy Jausoro, and his famous Orinkara dance troupe were here in Washington to be honored with a major national award in the arts. Here is a cultural group, which is large in Idaho, that has maintained its finest music and dance heritage. Although not Basque myself, I am proud of Jimmy and his group. I honor them for being true Americans who have preserved their great culture.

Mr. President, we cannot allow our great Nation to become divided as has our neighbor to the north and other nations which have a multiplicity of national languages. Language is the glue that holds a nation together and reduces suspicion among its citizens.

I urge my colleagues in this body to support Senator McCLURE's amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. DENTON] be made an original cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, since we are not going to have a record vote, I am not going to ask for one, I want the record to reflect that if we would have had such recorded vote, I would have voted no.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to.

Mr. SIMON. I simply want to join by saying if we were to have a record vote that would be my vote, too.

Mr. DOMENICI. I will state my reasons afterward so I will not have to keep anyone here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record will reflect that if there were a record vote, the vote of the Senator from New Mexico and the vote of the Senator from Illinois would be no.

Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment (No. 599), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EAGLETON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, had this vote been a rollcall vote, I would have voted no, for the reason that I think it could be handled on a significantly different piece of legislation. It makes me somewhat uncomfortable to deal with it on this legislation, and therefore I voted no. I am fully aware that the vote would have been very near what it was the previous time we voted, which was, I believe, about 76 to 23. I am fully aware of that, but I just wanted to state that to clarify my position.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to join with Senator SIMPSON in saying I, too, would have voted no on the amendment offered by Senator McCLURE.

Like him, I, too, felt that this bill was the wrong vehicle for this amendment—that it could be misunderstood.

I am gratified that the amendment was modified, but I still feel this legislation dealing with illegal migration and new enforcement policies is the wrong bill and could be interpreted as a rather negative statement by some groups in our society.

Mr. SIMPSON. If I can have the attention of my colleagues, that will conclude the voting for tonight. We have two other amendments we will process very briefly. Then I believe the hour of convening is set at 9 a.m. At least, the majority leader and I were speaking of that time. Then we will be back on the bill after the conclusion of morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair has an inquiry. What does the manager mean by process?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes, accepted by the majority and minority managers of the bill—one to be laid down and dealt with in the morning, one to be handled at the present time.

Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] be added as original cosponsor of the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 600

(Purpose: To extend the income and eligibility verification system under section 1137 of the Social Security Act so as to provide for verification of immigration status in the cases of aliens applying for benefits under specified welfare and other programs)

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] proposes an amendment numbered 600.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of title III add the following:

SEC. . VERIFICATION OF IMMIGRATION STATUS OF ALIENS APPLYING FOR BENEFITS UNDER CERTAIN PROGRAMS.

(a) REQUIRING IMMIGRATION STATUS VERIFICATION.—

(1) UNDER AFDC, MEDICAID, UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION, AND FOOD STAMP PROGRAM.—Section 1137 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320b-7) is amended—

(A) by redesignating paragraphs (4) through (7) of subsection (a) as paragraph (5) through (8), respectively, and inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) the State shall require, as a condition of eligibility for benefits under any program listed in subsection (b), that each applicant for or recipient of benefits under that program must declare in writing, under penalty of perjury, whether or not the individual is a citizen of the United States, and, if not a citizen of the United States, the individual shall present alien registration documentation or other proof of immigration registration from the Immigration and Naturalization Service that contain the individual's alien admission number, or alien file number (or numbers if he has more than one number), and—

"(A) if such an applicant or recipient is not a citizen of the United States, the State shall utilize the individual's alien file or alien admission number to verify with the Immigration and Naturalization Service the alien's immigration status through an automated or other system (designated by the Service for use with States) that—

"(i) utilizes the alien's name, file number admission number or other means permitting efficient verification, and

"(ii) protects the alien's privacy to the maximum degree possible,

"(B) if the verification under subparagraph (A) does not indicate that the individual is in an immigration status permitting eligibility for benefits under the applicable program—

"(i) the State shall provide the alien with an opportunity to prove otherwise by submitting to the State documents establishing a satisfactory immigration status for the applicable program, photostatic or other similar copies of which documents shall be transmitted by the State to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for official verification, and

"(ii) the State may not deny, reduce, or terminate an individual's benefits under the program on the basis of immigration status without affording the individual the opportunity described in clause (i), and

"(C) if an individual has been determined (after the opportunity described in subparagraph (B)(i)) to be an alien in an immigration status which does not permit the individual to be eligible for benefits under the applicable program, the State shall deny or terminate the individual's participation in the program;"; and

(B) in subsection (b), by striking out "income verification system" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu "income and eligibility verification system".

(2) UNDER SSI PROGRAM.—Section 1631(e)(1)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "subsections (a)(6) and (c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a)(4), (a)(7), and (c)".

(b) PROVIDING 90 PERCENT MATCHING FUNDS FOR NON-LABOR COSTS OF IMPLEMENTATION AND OPERATION.—

(1) UNDER AFDC PROGRAM.—Section 403(a)(3) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting before subparagraph (B) the following new subparagraph:

"(A) 90 percent of so much of such expenditures as are for the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4),".

(2) UNDER MEDICAID PROGRAM.—Section 1903(a) of such Act is amended by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) an amount equal to 90 percent of the sums expended during the quarter which are attributable to the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4); plus".

(3) UNDER UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION PROGRAM.—The first sentence of section 302(a) of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end the following: ", including 90 percent of so much of the reasonable expenditures of the State as are attributable to the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4)".

(4) UNDER CERTAIN TERRITORIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.—Sections 3(a)(4), 1003(a)(3), 1403(a)(3), 1603(a)(4) of the Social Security Act (as in effect without regard to section 301 of the Social Security Amendments of 1972) are each amended by redesignating subparagraph (B) as subparagraph (C) and inserting after subparagraph (A) the following new subparagraph:

"(B) 90 percent of so much of such expenditures as are for the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4); plus".

(5) UNDER THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM.—Section 16 of the food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2025) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(h) The Secretary is authorized to pay to each State agency an amount equal to 90 per centum of the non-labor costs incurred by the State Agency in implementing and operating the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4) of the Social Security Act.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) INS ESTABLISHING VERIFICATION SYSTEM BY OCTOBER 1, 1987.—The Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization shall implement a system for the verification of immigration status under section 1137(a)(4)(A) of the Social Security Act (as amended by this section) so that the system is available to all the States by not later than October 1, 1987.

(2) HIGHER MATCHING EFFECTIVE IN FISCAL YEAR 1988.—The amendments made by subsection (b) take effect on October 1, 1987.

(3) USE OF VERIFICATION SYSTEM REQUIRED IN FISCAL YEAR 1989.—The amendments made by subsection (a) take effect on October 1, 1988. States have until that date to begin complying with the requirements imposed by those amendments.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment pending at the desk be temporarily laid aside, and that it be the pending business when the Senate returns to consideration of S. 1200 tomorrow, September 13, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, before any more Senators leave the Chamber, might the Republican leader inform us whether there will be any more rollcall votes this evening, and what the prospects are for tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will indicate that I am advised by the managers that there will be no more rollcall votes this evening. There will be one amendment that will be accepted.

It is my understanding that we can proceed early tomorrow morning. There will be rollcall votes tomorrow and hopefully we can complete action on this bill between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, might I ask at what time the votes will take place?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I hope we will not find it necessary to have a rollcall vote on every amendment. There are amendments on both sides. We will do our best to hold down the number of votes.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky will be in Kentucky looking at a new source of energy, construction for which will be dedicated tomorrow. We hope it will give us a new source of energy. It is a new coal technology which is important to my State and other States. It is incumbent upon me to be there. I am afraid I will miss my first vote this year, if the Senate is not accommodating to stack the votes until Monday or Tuesday. I guess it is just beyond any realm of possibility to stack them until Tuesday.

Mr. DOLE. I will work with the distinguished minority leader to encourage our friends on both sides to have voice votes.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I appreciate the majority leader's comments. I hate to miss votes. If we could be accommodated, it would be important to several Senators on both sides who cannot be here tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. I understand.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SYMMS. Has a motion to reconsider the vote on the Hatch amendment been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been.

Mr. SYMMS. I make that motion and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is not in order unless the request is made by a Senator on the prevailing side.

AMENDMENT NO. 601

(Purpose: Express the sense of the Senate that the visa waiver pilot program will achieve highly desirable goals which are in the national interest)

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER], for himself and Mr. WARNER, proposes an amendment numbered 601.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 113, insert the following immediately before line 20:

(f) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that the visa waiver pilot program authorized by the amendments made by this section will provide economic benefits, greater international understanding and cooperation, and more efficient use of consular resources, and that such goals are highly desirable and in the national interest. The Senate reaffirms its support for such program.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, for many years the administration, the travel and tourism industry, and the Senate have supported legislation which would waive the U.S. visa requirement in certain cases.

In 1982, I sponsored the original visa waiver amendment to the Immigration Reform and Control Act. This body passed that amendment unanimously, and has reaffirmed its support for visa waiver every year since.

In 1983, the Immigration Reform and Control Act again passed with the visa waiver provision. The House passed an amended version in 1984. The bill has not been signed into law because of controversy over other provisions in the bill—not visa waiver.

Once again we are going forward in an attempt to pass an immigration reform bill. And once again, I am pleased to see that the Senate supports the enormously important visa waiver provision. However, visa waiver has not been included in the immigration reform package now being considered by the House of Representatives. I ask my colleagues to join me in insisting that visa waiver be part of this legislation.

Today I am offering this amendment to express the sense of the Senate that the visa waiver provision be included in the final package when the respective House and Senate bills go to the conference committee. By recognizing the importance of this provision and reaffirming our support, we are sending a clear message to the conferees on this matter, so I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

It is estimated that visa waiver would bring as many as 400,000 additional visitors into the United States from abroad, producing close to $300 million in U.S. tourism receipts. Based on these receipts, an estimated 7,000 to 8,000 travel-related jobs would be created and more than $16 million in tax receipts would be realized.

Our American embassies and consulates are often overwhelmed by processing visas. In some countries, backlogs are so bad that applicants cancel their travel plans to the United States.

The U.S. nonimmigrant visa requirements are among the most restrictive in the world. These restrictions retard our economic growth and serve as a self-imposed trade barrier against the United States. This restrictive approach increases our trade deficits and is very harmful to a very important U.S. industry. It is rather curious that, in the present atmosphere of growing protectionist sentiments and concern about our trade imbalance, we should add to our own problems by not enacting the visa waiver legislation into law. We are shooting ourselves in the foot if we fail to insist that visa waiver be retained in a House-Senate compromise on this important issue.

Mr. President, making travel to our country less restrictive will increase the number of visitors, reduce our trade deficit, add to our foreign exchange earnings, encourage economic growth, and break down another barrier to trade in tourism. The support of visa waiver legislation by this Senate is good commonsense and I ask my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my good friend from South Dakota, Mr. PRESSLER, in commending the distinguished majority whip, Mr. SIMPSON, for his courage and foresight in including in this important immigration reform legislation provisions allowing visa waiver.

Earlier this year the Senator from South Dakota and I, along with the Senators from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER and Mr. GORE; Hawaii, Mr. INOUYE and Mr. MATSUNAGA; Utah, Mr. HATCH; Alaska, Mr. MURKOWSKI; Ohio, Mr. GLENN; New Mexico, Mr. BINGAMAN; AND Illinois, Mr. SIMON, introduced S. 825, a bill to provide visa waivers for nonimmigrant tourists from certain countries.

We undertook this effort with the full recognition that Congressman ROMANO MAZZOLI and Senator SIMPSON intended to reintroduce the legislation before us today.

Our objective in promoting visa waiver was not to detract in any way from the unyielding and devoted efforts of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming.

Our objective was to provide additional momentum to help bring the Congress to grips with this very important issue.

Today, we reaffirm our support for immigration reform legislation including visa waiver, and urge that when this bill goes to conference with the House of Representatives, every effort be made to retain visa waiver.

With trade deficits running at such a high level, the United States must do everything it can to bolster its exports.

Inbound foreign travelers represent the second largest export for the United States.

In fact it is estimated that as many as 400,000 additional visitors from abroad would gladly respond to the aggressive marketing appeals of the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration and America's travel destinations were it not for the difficulties they face in obtaining nonimmigrant tourist visas.

Through the cooperative efforts of the Senator from Wyoming the Congress can help alleviate this problem.

The Senator from Virginia applauds the efforts and the leadership of the chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, and is grateful to the Senator from South Dakota and others for their unyielding support of the visa waiver provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my statement which appeared in the RECORD on March 18 of this year regarding visa waiver be printed at this point in today's proceedings.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER

Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. Pressler), and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Sasser), to introduce the Visa Waiver Act of 1985, a bill providing limited waiver of the U.S. non-immigrant visa requirements.

As co-chairman of the Senate Tourism Caucus, Senator Sasser and I have urged for many years now the enactment of this legislation, and we have eagerly joined with Senator Pressler in his capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Business, Trade, and Tourism, to obtain for America's travel and tourism industry the important benefits this legislation holds.

ECONOMIC IMPACT

Mr. President, international travel to the United States in 1983: accounted for 21.7 million total foreign arrivals and receipts of $13.9 billion (including international transportation payments to U.S. carriers); netted this nation 706 percent of total world international arrivals (286.5 million) and 11.9 percent of global foreign tourism expenditures (96.2 billion); resulted in federal, state, and local tax revenues of more than $1.1 billion; directly and indirectly generated over 600,000 U.S. jobs; and accounted for one-third of business services exports.

Based on one study, adjusted to reflect current data and assumptions under last year's bill, it is estimated that the proposed legislation will add as many as 400,000 visitors from abroad.

These visitors will produce $300 million in tourism receipts.

Based on these receipts, an estimated 7,000 to 8,000 travel-related jobs would be created and more than $16 million in tax receipts would be realized.

The State Department in 1980 estimated that 70 percent of the non-immigrant visas are related to tourism and three percent related to business activities.

The American embassies and consulates are frequently overwhelmed by the processing of these visas.

In some countries, backlogs are so bad that applicants get angry and cancel their plans to travel to the United States.

The State Department has determined that, if the new law had been in operation in 1982, over $3 million in resources and over 120 positions abroad could have been used for other purposes.

POLICY AND THE NATIONAL INTEREST

Studies conducted in 1977 for the U.S. Travel Service, predecessor to the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, determined that "difficult entry procedures and/or difficulty in obtaining a visa" inhibited some foreign nationals from visiting the United States.

An average of 13.6 percent of potential visitors from five of the countries eligible under legislation pending that year anticipated these difficulties.

The percent of actual visitors reporting such difficulties ranged from 25 percent (France) to four percent (Netherlands).

Most western European countries eliminated visa requirements for Americans and other visitors during the post-World War II era.

At least 35 countries have eliminated this requirement.

The present law requires that all foreign nationals, except those from Canada and the Bahamas, possess a visa to enter the United States as a visitor.

But U.S. laws concerning tourism support a visa waiver program.

Under the International Travel Act of 1961, the Secretary of Commerce is directed to ". . . encourage the simplification, reduction, or elimination of barriers to travel, and the facilitation of international travel generally," and "to stimulate and encourage travel to the United States by residents of foreign countries. . . ."

Further, the National Tourism Policy Act of 1981 establishes a national tourism policy whose principal objective is to ". . . encourage the free and welcome entry of individuals traveling to the United States in order to enhance international understanding and good will. . . ."

CONCLUSION

The non-immigrant visa requirements of the United States are among the most restrictive in the world.

The restrictions serve as a trade barrier, retarding economic growth and inhibiting good will.

The proposed legislation is in the national interest and will promote inbound travel.

Making travel to the United States less restrictive will increase the number of visitors, add to our foreign exchange earnings, encourage economic growth and break down another barrier to trade in tourism.

Visa waiver legislation like this bill is aggressively supported by the administration.

It passed in both the House of Representatives and the Senate in the last Congress, and it is endorsed by virtually all segments of the travel and tourism industry.

Mr. President, I urge the support of my colleagues for this measure, and I am hopeful it will receive swift and early consideration in this body as well as in the House of Representatives, where Congressman Bill Boner has introduced identical legislation.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I move adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, we feel we can accept the amendment since it reflects the intent of the committee regarding the visa waiver provision. I appreciate him offering it at this time.

I believe this amendment has been cleared on the minority side and is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment (No. 601) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, with regard to the Hawkins amendment which has been laid down, I ask unanimous consent that it be the pending business in the morning when we return to S. 1200.

NATIONAL HIGH-TECH MONTH

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having consulted with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 128, National High-Tech Month, reported today by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 128) designating the month of October 1985 as "National High-Tech Month."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE HISTORIC SITES ACT OF 1935

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 299, a joint resolution recognizing the accomplishments of the passage of the Historic Sites Act of 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 299) recognizing the accomplishments over the past 50 years resulting from the passage of the Historic Sites Act of 1935, one of this Nation's landmark preservation laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 299. This joint resolution would recognize the act approved August 21, 1935, popularly referred to as the Historic Sites Act of 1935, for its substantial contributions over the past 50 years to the identification and protection of the Nation's cultural heritage.

Mr. President, the Historic Sites Act has played a vital role in preserving places important in American history, places that Americans are visiting every day in increasing numbers, such as Gettysburg, Jamestown, Valley Forge, and Fort Laramie. Prior to the enactment of this measure, there was no existing legislation which served to preserve historic properties such as these. Concerned that many of these historically invaluable structures would be lost forever to development, interested citizens and public officials worked together to develop "a national policy to preserve for public use historic sites, buildings and objects of national significance for the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States." It is due to their hard work and foresight that on August 21, 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law the Historic Sites Act.

Mr. President, this legislation authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, through the National Park Service, to record and document historic structures; to survey historical and archeological properties; and to acquire, restore, and manage properties of historical value. Additionally, it authorizes the National Park Service to build and maintain museums at historic sites as well as provide the public with educational and interpretative materials about their historic significance. The act is also responsible for establishing the National Park System Advisory Board, whose members are expert in park-related disciplines such as history, archeology, architecture, and natural science.

Fifty years after the enactment of the Historic Sites Act, millions of people are benefiting from its legacy as they visit our historic places and reflect on the events and values which helped to shape our country. It is indeed fitting on the occasion of its 50th anniversary that we recognize the accomplishments resulting from the passage of the Historic Sites Act of 1935. I urge my colleagues to join me in commemorating one of this Nation's landmark preservation laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

TEXT OF THE GOVERNING INTERNATIONAL FISHING AGREEMENT WITH THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 77

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers, which pursuant to Public Law 94-265 was referred jointly to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (Public Law 94-265; 16 U.S.C. 1801 et seq.), (the Act), I transmit herewith the text of the Governing International Fishery Agreement between the Government of the United States and the Government of the People's Republic of China, which was signed at Washington on July 23, 1985.

This agreement is one of a series negotiated in accordance with the Act. It is the first such agreement to be concluded that incorporates the 1984 amendments to the Act, clearly establishing the relationship between a foreign nation's allocations requests and its contributions to the development of the U.S. fishery in which it is requesting allocations. This agreement will further the objectives of the Act and will serve to enhance relations between the United States and the People's Republic of China.

I recommend that the Congress give favorable consideration to this agreement at an early date.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 12, 1985.

TEXT OF THE GOVERNING INTERNATIONAL FISHING AGREEMENT WITH THE POLISH PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 78

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers, which pursuant to Public Law 94-265 was referred jointly to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (Public Law 94-265; 16 U.S.C. 1801 et seq.), (the Act), I transmit herewith the text of the Governing International Fishery Agreement between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Polish People's Republic, which was signed at Washington on August 1, 1985.

This agreement is one of a series negotiated in accordance with the Act. It is a renegotiated agreement that will allow the fisheries relationship between the United States and the Polish People's Republic to continue when the agreement currently in force expires on December 31, 1985. It incorporates the 1984 amendments to the Act that clearly establish the relationship between a foreign nation's allocations requests and its contributions to the development of the U.S. fishery in which it is requesting allocations. This agreement will further the objectives of the Act and will permit the fishing industries of the United States and the Polish People's Republic to continue without interruption the cooperative fishery arrangements that have developed since the first such agreement was signed with the Polish People's Republic in 1977.

I recommend that the Congress give favorable consideration to this agreement at an early date.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 12, 1985.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 1630. A bill to substitute the employment of American citizens for Soviet nationals employed by the United States diplomatic mission or United States consular posts in the Soviet Union, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

U.S. FOREIGN MISSIONS SECURITY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to require the Department of State to replace all Soviets employed at United States diplomatic and consular missions in the Soviet Union with United States personnel. This action is long overdue.

There are more than 200 Soviet citizens working in our Moscow Embassy, and the Department of State has confirmed that most, if not all, report to the KGB in one way or another. Think about that. Most of the approximately 200 Soviet citizens employed in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow are in a position to spy on our diplomatic corps on a daily basis. I am worried about that, Mr. President, and I think something needs to be done. Hiring Soviet citizens to work in our Embassy is an invitation to easy espionage. What really irritates me is the fact that the Soviets, as a general rule, do not allow American citizens in their Washington Embassy. I believe it's about time we start playing the game by the same rules.

I am also alarmed by revelations of stepped-up Soviet use of the chemical compound NPPD, a tracking agent used on individuals under KGB surveillance. This chemical is a known mutagen, a cancer-causing agent, and it may jeopardize the health and well-being of our diplomatic personnel in the Soviet Union. The United States asks a great deal from its Foreign Service officers. These individuals frequently find themselves in dangerous situations—situations often beyond their control. It is not unusual for diplomatic staff and Embassy personnel to be put under surveillance, and the use of various substances and devices to track the movements of individuals is widespread. But, Mr. President, it is certainly a matter of extreme concern when KGB methods place American Foreign Service officers and their dependents at a significant health risk. And this is exactly what has happened in Moscow. There is even a possibility that NPPD was used inside the American chancery by Soviet employees.

For these reasons, I am introducing the U.S. Embassy Security Improvement Act of 1985. This legislation would require the Department of State to replace all Soviet citizens in United States diplomatic or consular missions in the Soviet Union with American personnel at the earliest opportunity, unless the Secretary of State certifies that the Soviet citizen does not pose a significant threat to American security, or the Soviet employee is necessary to provide usual and customary services to Americans, and an American replacement would greatly reduce efficiency at the Embassy, or the Soviet worker is engaged in an occupation which precludes his or her entry into American diplomatic and consular missions in the Soviet Union. To carry out the goal of replacing Soviet workers, and to study and implement ways to improve security at other American missions in Eastern Europe, my legislation authorizes a sum not to exceed $12 million for fiscal year 1986 and $33 million for fiscal year 1987. These figures are based on State Department estimates.

There are over 200 probable Soviet agents employed in our diplomatic mission in Moscow. This represents a threat to our security, and it's a situation we should avoid. I believe we must focus more attention on embassy security in the Soviet Union and Eastern-bloc nations. Reducing Soviet accessibility to American diplomatic and consular missions represents a step in the right direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1630

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congres assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "United States Foreign Missions Security Improvement Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State shall, at the earliest opportunity, replace Soviet nationals who are employed by the United States diplomatic mission or by United States consular posts in the Soviet Union with American citizens unless the Secretary determines and so certifies to the Congress every twelve months from the date of enactment of this Act for each such Soviet national whose employment is continued that—

(1) such Soviet national does not pose a significant threat to the Security of the United States;

(2) the employment of such Soviet national is necessary to provide usual and customary services to United States nationals, and the employment of a United States national as a replacement for such Soviet national would reduce to a significant extent the efficiency of operations at a United States diplomatic mission or consular post; or

(3) such Soviet national is employed in an occupation which precludes entry into the facilities of a United States diplomatic mission or consular post in the Soviet Union.

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of State for the purpose of carrying out section 2 and for studying and implementing ways to improve security at United States diplomatic missions and consular posts in Eastern European countries $12,000,000 for the fiscal year 1986 and $33,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987.

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. DODD, and Mr. BRADLEY):

S. 1631. A bill to further the national security and improve the economy of the United States by providing grants for the improvement of proficiency in critical languages, for the improvement of elementary and secondary foreign language instruction, and for per capita grants to reimburse institutions of higher education to promote the growth and improve the quality of postsecondary foreign language instruction; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE ASSISTANCE FOR NATIONAL SECURITY ACT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, our Nation may be the most self-centered of developed countries about language, much to our detriment in terms of national security, international trade, and intercultural understanding. A recent compilation by the U.S. Department of Education lists 169 languages as critical to the national interest. The languages range from Bassa to French, from Yoruba to Japanese. The rationale is simple. In order to do business abroad—a priority with our current balance of trade problems—and to understand events in the world which affect our national security, we must break down language barriers.

Advances in physics, printed in German journals, do not reach our scientists in a timely way because of a multimonth lag in translating these technical texts, and frequently never reach us. Trade with Japan is hampered, in part, by our lack of understanding of their language and culture. Even our long-term European trading partners give preferential treatment to businesses that speak their languages.

Political disturbances around the world are often in areas about which our Nation does not have the knowledge or language expertise. Our responses are delayed and sometimes wrong because we lack that knowledge.

Currently, title VI programs in the Higher Education Act fund a small part of the 93 language and area studies centers which enable students and professionals to study 150 languages on the Department of Education's critical list.

We need to do more. Languages are best learned at an early age. Language requirements for entry into and graduation from postsecondary institutions are motivations for language training at lower grade levels. While I strongly support title VI programs, we need to do much more to strengthen our Nation's resources of language and area studies experts. We should introduce all students to another language and culture. This will help our business community, our national defense, and international understanding.

I am introducing legislation to encourage language study at both the precollege and college levels. This legislation was introduced in the House and passed that Chamber in 1984 by a margin of 265 to 120. A similar bill introduced today in the Senate cosponsored by Senators ROCKEFELLER, DODD, BRADLEY, and MOYNIHAN contains the following provisions:

Establishes a system of competitive grants among States for funding model foreign language programs to be run by local school districts and community colleges. A small portion of funding in this section is reserved for direct grants to local education agencies.

Authorizes grants to colleges and universities to reimburse them for part of the costs of providing foreign language instruction to students. This is to encourage colleges and universities to have language entrance and exit requirements, to encourage students to take more than 2 years of a language, and to encourage students to study one of the less commonly taught languages.

Authorizes grants to institutions or consortia of higher education institutions to establish intensive summer language programs for exceptional high school students and for elementary and secondary school foreign language teachers.

Authorizes grants to universities and consortia of universities to pay not more than half the costs of sending advanced language students abroad.

A Federal program of support established in the proposed legislation will initially total less than $75 million per year in outlays. The return will repay our investment many times over. Business, diplomacy, national security, international understanding—there is no price tag on these vital sectors of national life. I invite my colleagues to join me in encouraging foreign language study and proficiency.

Mr. President a few years ago I was able to get an amendment adopted to the Foreign Service Act of 1980, which called upon the Secretary of State to designate two Embassies in which everyone working had to speak the language of the host country.

Despite great reluctance from the State Department and others, I was finally able to get the amendment adopted.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig designated Senegal and Uruguay as the two countries.

I thought my colleagues might be interested in a letter I've received from Inspector General William C. Harrop of the State Department. I ask unanimous consent that his letter and a copy of the bill be inserted in the RECORD.

Clearly, our country, which is so deficient in foreign language skills, and our Foreign Service which, unfortunately, suffers from the same problem, ought to do more to require local language ability.

Exactly how we expand upon this experience, I will leave to my colleagues in the Foreign Relations Committee, but we should follow through.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1631

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "Foreign Language Assistance for National Security Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the economic and security interests of this Nation require significant improvement in the quantity and quality of foreign language instruction offered in the Nation's educational institutions, and Federal funds should be made available to assist this purpose;

(2) many endeavors in both the public and private sectors involving such matters as international relations or multinational business transactions require the skills of individuals with knowledge of foreign languages; and

(3) the educational institutions of the Nation should provide students with an understanding of the history and culture which influence the perspectives, values, and attitudes of the people of other countries, and foreign language instruction is one means of achieving this goal.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to State educational agencies whose applications are approved under subsection (b) in order that such agencies may fund model programs, designed and operated by local educational agencies, providing for commencement or improvement and expansion of foreign language study for students residing within their school districts. Any State whose application is approved shall receive an amount equal to the sum of (1) $275,000, plus (2) the product of $0.06 multiplied by the population of the State (as determined in accordance with the most recent decennial census). The amount described in the preceding sentence shall be made available to the State for two additional years after the first fiscal year during which the State received a grant under this section if the Secretary determines that the funds made available to the State during the first year of funding were used in the manner required under the State's approved application.

(b) Any State educational agency desiring to receive a grant under this section shall submit an application therefor to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of model programs designed by local educational agencies, and representing a variety of alternative and innovative approaches to foreign language instruction, which were selected school district of the local educational agency shall be eligible to participate in any model program funded under this section (without regard to whether such children attend schools operated by such agency);

(3) provides assurances that, if the application of the State educational agency is approved, each model program described in the application shall have available to it sufficient funds from State and local sources, in addition to any funds under this section, to ensure that the program is carried out as described in the application; and

(4) provides that the local educational agency will provide reliable and valid evaluations of pupils' proficiency at appropriate intervals in the program, and provide such evaluations to the State educational agency.

(c)(1) To the extent consistent with the number of children in the State or in the school district of each local educational agency who are enrolled in private elementary and secondary schools, such State or agency shall, after consultation with appropriate private school representatives, make provision for including special educational services and arrangements (such as dual enrollment, educational radio and television, and mobile educational services and equipment) in which such children can participate and which meet the requirements of this section. Expenditures for educational services and arrangements pursuant to this subsection for children in private schools shall be equal (taking into account the number of children to be served and the needs of such children) to expenditures for children enrolled in the public schools of the State or local educational agency.

(2) If by reason of any provision of law a State or local educational agency is prohibited from providing for the participation of children from private schools as required by paragraph (1), or if the Secretary determines that a State or local educational agency has substantially failed or is unwilling to provide for such participation on an equitable basis, the Secretary shall waive such requirements and shall arrange for the provision of services to such children which shall be subject to the requirements of this subsection. Such waivers shall be subject to consultation, withholding, notice, and judicial review requirements in accordance with section 557(b) (3) and (4) of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981.

(d) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which State educational agencies may receive under subsection (a), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

(e)(1) From sums reserved for each fiscal year pursuant to section 11(b)(1) to carry out the provisions of this subsection, the Secretary is authorized to make grants to local educational agencies whose applications are approved under paragraph (3) in order that such agencies may support exemplary programs providing for commencing or improving and expanding foreign language study for students residing within their school districts.

(2) The Secretary may not approve any application for a grant under this subsection unless the Secretary determines that the exemplary program described in the application is consistent with the State programs approved under subsection (a) for the State in which the local educational agency is located.

(3) Each local educational agency desiring to receive a grant under this subsection shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing or accompanied by such information and assurances as the Secretary may require.

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to State agencies whose applications are approved under subsection (b) for the purpose of providing assistance to model programs designed and operated by community and junior colleges providing for the commencement or improvement and expansion of foreign language studies at those institutions. Any State whose application is so approved shall receive an amount equal to the sum of (1) $30,000, plus (2) the product of $0.01 multiplied by the population of the State (as determined in accordance with the most recent decennial census).

(b) Any State desiring to receive a grant under this section shall, through a State agency designated (in accordance with State law) for this purpose, submit an application therefor to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of model programs designed by community and junior colleges, and representing a variety of alternative and innovative approaches to foreign language instruction, which were selected by the State agency for funding under this section;

(2) provides assurances that, if the application of the State agency is approved, each model program described in the application shall have available to it sufficient funds from State and local sources, in addition to any funds under this section, to ensure that the program is carried out as described in the application; and

(3) provides that the community and junior colleges will provide reliable and valid evaluations of pupils' proficiency at appropriate intervals in the program, and provide such evaluations to the State agency.

(c) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which State agencies may receive under subsection (a), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

SEC. 5. (a)(1) The Secretary shall make grants to institutions of higher education to reimburse such institutions for part of the costs of providing undergraduate foreign language instruction to students at such institutions. Any institution of higher education desiring to receive a grant under this section shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require.

(2)(A) An institution of higher education shall not be eligible for a grant under this section for a fiscal year unless—

(i) the sum of the number of students enrolled at such institution in qualified postsecondary language courses on October 1 of that fiscal year exceeds 5 per centum of the total number of students enrolled at such institution; and

(ii) such institution requires that each entering student have successfully completed at least two years of secondary school foreign language instruction or requires that each graduating student have earned two years of postsecondary credit in a foreign language (or have demonstrated equivalent competence in a foreign language).

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A)(i), the total number of students enrolled in an institution shall be considered to be equal to the sum of (i) the number of full-time degree candidate students enrolled at the institution, and (ii) the number of part-time degree candidate students who are enrolled at the institution for an academic workload which is at least half the full-time academic workload, as determined by the institution in accordance with standards prescribed by the Secretary.

(3) As a condition for the award of any grant under this section, the Secretary may establish criteria for evaluating programs assisted with funds under this section and require an annual report which evaluates the progress and proficiency of students in such programs.

(b)(1) Any institution of higher education which submits an application under this section for a grant for any fiscal year, and which has sufficient undergraduate enrollment in postsecondary language courses and foreign language requirements as required under subsection (a)(2), shall be eligible to receive an amount equal to the sum of the following:

(A) To provide assistance for the costs of postsecondary foreign language instruction at the level of the first or second year of postsecondary study of a language, an amount equal to—

(i) $30, multiplied by

(ii) the remainder, if any, of—

(I) the number of students enrolled in a qualified postsecondary foreign language course at such level on October 1 of such fiscal year, minus

(II) the number of students equal to 5 per centum of the total number of students enrolled at such institution.

(B) To provide assistance for the costs of foreign language instruction above the level of the second year of postsecondary study of a language, an amount equal to—

(i) $40, multiplied by

(ii) the number of students enrolled in a qualified postsecondary foreign language course at such level on October 1 of such fiscal year.

(2) Any institution which is eligible to receive an amount under paragraph (1) shall be eligible to receive an additional amount equal to $40 multiplied by the number of students enrolled (at any level of instruction) in any foreign language instruction in languages determined by the Secretary to be less commonly taught.

(c) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which an institution of higher education may receive under subsection (b), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to an institution of higher education (or a consortium of such institutions) in each Federal region whose application is approved under subsection (b) for the purposes of providing assistance to summer intensive language training institutes for exceptional secondary school students. Any institution or consortium whose application is so approved shall receive an amount equal to not more than $3,000 multiplied by the number of students, not to exceed one hundred and fifty, enrolled in such institute.

(b) Any institution of higher education or consortium of such institutions desiring to receive the grant for its region shall submit an application therefor to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No such application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of the proposed program of intensive instruction, which may include, but is not limited to, the languages described in section 8(b)(1);

(2) provides adequate assurance that students from any Federal region who wish to participate will be selected on the basis of aptitude in that language, as determined by appropriate testing and verified by their teachers, and of motivation;

(3) provides assurances that the institution of higher education will seek to enroll at least eighty qualified students in the institute; and

(4) provides assurances that the program of intensive instruction will be developed and operated in close cooperation with secondary school teachers and administrators.

(c) The Secretary shall encourage, to the extent possible, diversity in the languages taught in institutes during any summer with the United States.

(d) Awards under this section shall be made to institutes (or consortia) on the basis of excellence of the program proposed in the application, taking into consideration such elements as library resources, faculty achievement, and language learning facilities.

(e) Funds available to institutes under this section may be used to cover costs associated with enrollment in an institute, including tuition, fees, administration, and living expenses.

(f) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which institutions of higher education may receive under subsection (a), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

SEC. 7. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to an institution of higher education (or a consortium of such institutions) in each Federal region whose application is approved under subsection (b) for the purposes of providing assistance to summer language training institutes for the professional development of the proficiency of elementary and secondary school language teachers. Any institution or consortium whose application is so approved shall receive an amount equal to not more than $3,000 multiplied by the number of teachers, not to exceed three hundred, enrolled in such institute.

(b) Any institution of higher education or consortium of such institutions desiring to receive the grant for its region shall submit an application therefor to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No such application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of the proposed program of instruction;

(2) provides adequate assurance that teachers from any Federal region who wish to participate will be selected on the basis of recommendations from a principal or other supervisory official and a demonstrated commitment to the teaching of the language studied in the institute; and

(3) provides assurances that the institution of higher education will seek to enroll at least eighty qualified teachers in the institute.

(c) Awards under this section shall be made to institutes (or consortia) on the basis of excellence of the program proposed in the application, taking into consideration such elements as library resources, faculty achievement, and language learning facilities.

(d) Funds available to institutes under this section may be used to cover costs associated with enrollment in an institute, including tuition, fees, administration, and living expenses.

(e) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which institutions of higher education may receive under subsection (a), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

SEC. 8. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to institutions of higher education, or to consortia of such institutions, whose application is approved under subsection (b) for the purposes of providing assistance to enable advanced foreign language students to develop their language skills and their knowledge of foreign cultures and societies through study abroad. Such study abroad may be combined with an internship in an international business enterprise. Any institution or consortium whose application is so approved shall be eligible to receive a grant in an amount not to exceed one-half the cost of providing such assistance.

(b) Any institution of higher education or consortium of such institutions desiring to receive a grant under this section shall submit an application therefor to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No such application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of the proposed program of study abroad in any of the following areas:

(A) Latin America, the Caribbean, and Puerto Rico for the study of Spanish, Portuguese, and other major languages of that region;

(B) the Middle East for the study of Arabic and other major languages of that region;

(C) Japan for the study of Japanese;

(D) the People's Republic of China or the Republic of China for the study of Chinese;

(E) the Republic of Korea for the study of Korean;

(F) the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for the study of Russian and other major languages of that region;

(G) Africa for the study of major languages of that region;

(H) South Asia for the study of Hindi and other major languages of that region;

(I) Eastern Europe for the study of major languages of that region; and

(J) Southeast Asia for the study of major languages of that region;

(2) provides adequate assurance that those who wish to participate will be selected on the basis of demonstrated proficiency in the language, as shown by testing comparable to that conducted by the Foreign Service Institute of the Department of State; and

(3) demonstrates that the program will provide the opportunity to combine language study with the study of journalism, international business, finance, economic development, science, engineering, political science, international studies, or other related areas and is open to students majoring in those areas if they can qualify under paragraph (2).

(c) Funds available to institutions under this section may be used to cover costs associated with the study abroad program, including tuition, fees, administration, and living expenses.

(d) If sums appropriated to carry out this section are not sufficient to permit the Secretary to pay in full the grants which institutions of higher education may receive under subsection (a), the amount of such grants shall be ratably reduced.

SEC. 9. No grants shall be made or contracts entered into under this Act except to such extent, or in such amounts, as may be provided in appropriation Acts.

SEC. 10. For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "institution of higher education" means any institution of higher education, as defined under section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965, which is located within a State, but does not include a community or junior college.

(2) The terms "community college" and "junior college" mean any institution of higher education, as defined under section 1201(a) of such Act, which is located within a State and which provides a two-year program for which awards an associate degree or which is acceptable for full credit toward a bachelor's degree.

(3) The terms "local educational agency" and "State educational agency" have the same meaning given such terms under section 198 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(4) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(5) The term "State" means any of the several States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(6) The term "qualified postsecondary foreign language course" means a course of foreign language instruction which (A) is scheduled to meet at least five days each week for at least fifty minutes each day, or (B) provides instruction each week for a period of time equivalent to the period described under clause (A).

SEC. 11. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1986 such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated for each of the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989—

(1) $35,000,000 to carry out section 3 of this Act of which $5,000,000 in each fiscal year shall be available to carry out subsection (e) of section 3;

(2) $4,000,000 to carry out section 4 of this Act;

(3) $11,000,000 to carry out section 5 of this Act;

(4) $5,000,000 to carry out section 6 of this Act;

(5) $10,000,000 to carry out section 7 of this Act; and

(6) $10,000,000 to carry out section 8 of this Act.

DEAR SENATOR SIMON: I know that you are primarily responsible for the provision of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 which set up the model post language program for two of our embassies abroad. We have recently inspected one of these posts, Dakar, Senegal, and I thought you would be interested in the following excerpt from our report:

The mission's status as a model language post has also contributed to the Embassy's exceptional performance in all areas. The model language program requires that all American personnel have prescribed levels of competence in French. Although the program has been in effect only two years, the Ambassador and virtually all personnel of the mission are convinced that the program has contributed significantly to the professional performance. The inspectors agree. Proficiency in French has clearly enhanced the ability of all officers and staff to gain access, gather information, communicate, and negotiate. While helping them to perform more effectively, the program has also helped them to adjust more easily to living overseas. Some agencies have not yet taken adequate account of the new model language requirements in their personnel assignment systems, resulting in prolonged delays in filling several highly skilled positions, such as the AID supervisory program officer and the Peace Corps doctor. However, the local AID and Peace Corps missions agree that French language capability in Senegal is important, although AID believes more flexibility is needed in implementing the language requirement.

The model language program is due or formal evaluation in early fiscal year 1986. While the benefits are hard to quantify, the inspectors conclude that the language requirement has made an important contribution to performance and morale in Dakar and should be continued.

I believe you can draw great pride from the results of your initiative.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM C. HARROP,
Inspector General, U.S. State Department.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator SIMON, in introducing legislation to improve the foreign language proficiency of our Nation's students and teachers. We have raised this issue before; Senator SIMON, then a Member of the House of Representatives, introduced similar legislation in the last Congress (H.R. 2708), while I introduced a companion measure in the Senate (S. 1795).

The steady decline of American foreign language proficiency has been well documented, most notably in three General Accounting Office studies and a 1979 report of the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies. Each of these analyses concluded the decline in foreign language competency in this country poses significant problems for the success of our economy, educational system, and international relations.

Throughout this century there has been a steady decrease in the number of students studying foreign languages—paradoxically, during this same period, the United States assumed a leading role in international affairs. The President's Commission reported in 1979 that the percentage of school students studying a foreign language peaked in 1915 at 36 percent. That number had declined to 24 percent by 1966, and to just 15 percent by 1979. The Commission also noted that "8 percent of American colleges and universities now require a foreign language for admission, compared with 34 percent in 1966."

In "A Nation At Risk," published in 1983, the National Commission on Excellence in Education concluded that foreign language study "introduces students to non-English-speaking cultures, heightens awareness and comprehension of one's native tongue, and serves the Nation's needs in commerce, diplomacy, defense, and education." The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, and its president, Mr. Ernest L. Boyer, former chancellor of the State University of New York, concurred, in their fine report, High School: "In an increasingly interdependent world, foreign language study must be a vital part of the core of common learning."

Not only should students learn foreign languages, instruction should begin at an early age. The Carnegie Foundation report noted that there is no "right" time to learn a foreign language, and recommended that study begin by the fourth grade and continue through high school.

Our legislation would authorize $75 million annually to promote foreign language instruction for students and teachers at all levels of education. Some $30 million would be provided to State education agencies to support model foreign language programs, and an additional $5 million would be made available directly to local education agencies for demonstration projects and exemplary programs. Summer institutes would provide training for language instructors and hone the skills of outstanding high school students. Elementary and secondary schools, as well as junior and community colleges, would receive assistance to develop foreign language curricula. Colleges and universities with language requirements would receive supplemental Federal aid, and additional aid for programs offering less commonly taught languages such as Russian, Chinese or Japanese. Finally, this legislation would fund overseas study combining language programs with internships in international business.

This legislation addresses the diverse and complex aspects of foreign language instruction. Programs for elementary students will promote lifelong foreign language fluency. Programs for high school and college students will complement their studies of world literature and history, and help produce adults better able to compete in the world economy. In sum, this measure provides multiple and complementary solutions to a complex, chronic shortcoming.

Our ability to communicate with our allies, as well as our adversaries, is an important link in our security as well as our economic success. A small minority of the world's population speaks English as its native language. It is regrettable that this ethnically rich and culturally diverse Nation is fast losing its ability to talk to many of the other peoples of the world. I urge my colleagues to join me in this measure to improve our Nation's foreign language skills.●

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities and as cochair of the House/Senate International Education Study Group, I rise in strong support of the Foreign Language Assistance for National Security Act of 1985.

America is faced with a challenge that involves our national security, our economic prosperity, and our ability to conduct a realistic and successful foreign policy in the troubled times ahead. Yet this is not a challenge to develop more sophisticated weaponry or to conquer the far reaches of space. It is a challenge to improve our ability to understand and communicate with other nations.

Unfortunately, in the face of a world becoming more closely intertwined economically, politically, and militarily, the response of our Nation has been—to say the least—inadequate. At all educational levels, we are failing to produce American students with the foreign language skills necessary to meet this challenge. Make no mistake about it. Today's youngsters are tomorrow's diplomats, intelligence experts, and international business people. Yet we are failing to provide them with the skills necessary to compete with other nations in the political, military, and economic arenas. Through the passage of this legislation, Congress can help to reverse this trend, to guarantee that our Nation has the human resources necessary to protect our vital national interests, at home and abroad.

The Foreign Language Assistance for National Security Act represents a well-balanced attempt to deal with the critical lack of foreign language skills in our schools, and in our diplomatic, intelligence, and business communities. In order to stimulate foreign language training at the elementary and secondary levels, our legislation would authorize grants to States for the funding of model programs in local school districts. It would also provide grants to institutions of higher education which establish foreign language entrance or exit requirements, and which have at least 5 percent of their students enrolled in foreign language courses. These two programs are complementary, and provide an essential system of incentives for educational institutions to provide students with the skills they will need to succeed in business, in Government, and in everyday life.

Section 6 and 7 of our proposal would authorize the Secretary of Education to establish summer foreign language training institutes for exceptional high school language students and elementary and secondary language teachers. These institutes would help outstanding students become proficient in a language early on, and would encourage the introduction of innovative teaching techniques into the foreign language curricula of our Nation's schools. These provisions of the bill are essential if we are to begin to identify and train those whose outstanding aptitude for languages can serve America's interests in a variety of areas.

Section 8 of the bill would provide much needed Federal matching funds for advanced language study abroad. The "immersion method" of teaching languages and cross-cultural skills is the most effective means we have of instilling in students a comprehensive understanding of a particular country or region. The funds authorized under section 8 would be specifically targeted at students who plan to visit those Nations which are most important to the future security and prosperity of the United States. Again, as in sections 1 through 7, section 8 places primary emphasis on developing those human resources which our Nation will need to compete in the decades ahead.

As Adm. Bobby Inman, former Deputy Director of the CIA, told Congress in 1981, "the foreign language capability of our Nation is poor and getting worse." This trend can be traced directly to our elementary and secondary schools, and to our colleges and universities. At the elementary level, fewer than 1 percent of our pupils currently receive any foreign language instruction. At the secondary level, only 15 percent of American students study a second language, and just 5 percent pursue these studies for more than 2 years. Only 10 percent of our postsecondary institutions require a foreign language for admission, and the vast majority mandate no language training during a 4-year undergraduate education. Most important, less than 1 percent of American students who are enrolled in foreign language programs study Chinese, Japanese, Arabic, and Russian, which together comprise 80 percent of the spoken languages of the world. It comes as no surprise then that there are more teachers of English in the Soviet Union than there are students of Russian in the United States.

It is also becoming increasingly clear that our Nation's diplomatic, intelligence, and economic efforts are being held hostage to this antiquated and ethnocentric national education policy. We have so few college graduates competent in foreign languages that the State Department can fill only 66 percent of the Foreign Service positions which require even minimum language competence. Of the 13,000 positions in the Department of Defense which require foreign language capability, only half are filled by individuals with the necessary language competence. In the CIA, the NSA, and the other intelligence agencies, we simply cannot find enough qualified linguists to staff our increasingly sophisticated network of data collection and analysis. In 1981, Admiral Inman told Congress that recruiting qualified individuals for intelligence positions "has been made difficult by the fact that many universities and colleges no longer have foreign language requirements as part of their mandatory curriculum. We need to be able to recruit and hire people who already possess capability in a foreign language."

In testimony before the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, Maj. Gen. Richard Larkin, of the Defense Intelligence Agency, concurred. He stated that "this problem is directly related to the inability of our educational system to continue to provide the talent required for understanding foreign cultures and interpreting their behavior."

In the same congressional hearing, Craig Wilson, Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Intelligence and Human Resources, concluded:

> The American population no longer presents us (the Defense Department) with a large talent bank of bilingual and multilingual people on which to draw to meet current and future needs . . . the problems, the shortfalls, won't be eliminated overnight.

In the economic sphere, we are similarly dependent on our ability to understand other languages and cultures. International trade now accounts for a full 25 percent of our gross national product. Forty percent of U.S. farmland produces for export, and 20 percent of U.S. industrial output is sold abroad. All told, one in five Americans depends on international trade for employment. Far more than at any previous time in our history, the economic decisions and actions of other countries are of central importance to our own national economic well-being. Most important, we depend more than ever on foreign markets of sustaining our sales, profits, and jobs.

I would ask my colleagues to consider the following examples of the commercial disasters which ignorance of other languages and cultures can help to create. When General Motors advertised its "Body by Fisher" car in Belgium, the slogan was described in Flemish as "Corpse by Fisher." Similarly, when Chevrolet tried to market its Nova model in Puerto Rico and Latin America, the company's advertising executives failed to realize that "No Va" is Spanish for "It Doesn't Go." And who can forget the Pepsi-Cola Co.'s use of its "Come Alive With Pepsi" advertising campaign in Taiwan. The literal translation of this slogan was "Pepsi Brings Your Ancestors Back From the Grave."

In order to avoid commercial blunders of this type in the future, our secondary schools and colleges need to produce potential business executives who are competent in foreign languages. Unlike our Defense and Intelligence Agencies, the American business community has no means to provide foreign language training to its new hires. As Richard McElheny, Director General of the U.S. and Foreign Commercial Service, told Congress last April:

> Language training in our schools and colleges * * * provides business with employees who have a head start and helps sell American products in world markets.

Without this essential language training, our pool of future business executives will be doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past.

Mr. President, when we consider the dearth of foreign language skills in our diplomatic, intelligence, and business communities, the need for congressional enactment of our legislation becomes clear. There is a direct connection between our poor language capabilities as a Nation, and the second-class status of foreign language education in our Nation's schools. This proposal does not call on the Federal Government to assume total responsibility for the foreign language education of our Nation's children. It simply recognizes that it is our responsibility to help create a pool of foreign language competent Americans which our government and business community can draw from in the future. Because the States have neither the resources nor the inclination to undertake this difficult task alone, congressional action in this area can act as a catalyst, encouraging States and localities to educate our children for the 21st century.

In closing, I would like to urge my colleagues to heed the ominous words of former U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim:

> Many civilizations in history have collapsed at the very height of their achievement because they were unable to analyze their basic problems, to change direction, and to adjust to the new situations which faced them.

We, in Congress, have analyzed the basic problem, and now we have a chance to change direction. I hope my colleagues will not allow this opportunity to pass us by.●

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senator DODD, Senator MOYNIHAN, and Senator ROCKEFELLER in supporting this important legislation offered by Senator SIMON. As Senator SIMON has already mentioned, our poor national performance with respect to foreign language learning places us at a considerable disadvantage in the areas of international commerce, international exchange of scientific and technical information, and intercultural communication and understanding. The unfortunate state of foreign language competence in the United States also has implications for the Nation's security. Our diplomatic, intelligence, and defense agencies have a prodigious appetite for persons with advanced training in foreign languages. The Federal Government has over 30,000 positions requiring foreign language competence, many of them requiring advanced skills. Year after year the Government experiences difficulty trying to fill these positions.

In the international trade arena, we have become painfully aware in recent years of the consequences of this lack of language expertise. A significant part of our trade difficulties with Japan stem in part from a fundamental dearth of knowledge about Japanese language and culture. While Japanese trade experts have invested considerable time and effort in learning our language and culture, U.S. trade experts have not made similar efforts to understand Japanese language and culture. Given the fact that we do not share a common cultural heritage with Japan, as we do with Western European trade partners, this lack of expertise will continue to work to the disadvantage of American companies who are seeking Japanese markets.

Mr. President, a variety of studies have appeared in recent years detailing the dismal state of foreign language learning in our Nation's schools. While students in most European countries begin mandatory foreign language education during their elementary school years, studies suggest that only a modest proportion of our students study any foreign language at the secondary school level. Indeed, a 1980 study of high school diploma requirements found that only eight States require their high schools to offer foreign language instruction; none of these States require students to complete a single foreign language course as a prerequisite for graduation. The vast majority of our institutions of higher education do not require any foreign language competence as a prerequisite for admission. As James Perkins, chairman of the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies, has noted:

> The hard and brutal fact is that our programs and institutions for education and training for foreign language and international understanding are both currently inadequate and actually falling further behind.

The report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, "A Nation At Risk," recognized the importance of foreign language instruction for our Nation's future. According to the authors of this report, the study of foreign language introduces students to non-English-speaking cultures, heightens awareness and comprehension of one's native tongue, and serves the Nation's needs in commerce, diplomacy, defense, and education. The Commission recommended that high school students complete at least 2 years of foreign language instruction and noted that true proficiency would require from 4 to 6 years of study.

In summary, Mr. President, we need to find the means to strengthen the country's pool of expertise in foreign language studies. The Foreign Language Assistance for National Security Act represents a sound, carefully reasoned approach to this problem. In an increasingly interdependent world, the ability of a nation to thrive economically, socially, and intellectually will depend on the ability of its citizens to communicate in a multilingual world. I commend Senator SIMON for his sponsorship to this bill and urge my colleagues to support this important piece of legislation.●

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 1632. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to require that employers provide an extension of health plan coverage at group rates for family members of deceased, divorced, or medicare-eligible workers; to the Committee on Finance.

HEALTH INSURANCE CONTINUATION ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today there are 35 million Americans for whom an accident or illness carries a special threat of financial disaster, unnecessary pain or disability—even death. These are the men, women, and children without health insurance. The problem of access to health insurance is not a new one, but the magnitude of the problem has increased. Between 1979 and 1983 alone, the ranks of the uninsured in this country swelled by more than 20 percent.

Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today—the Health Insurance Continuation Act—which focuses on the plight of one particular group, widowed or divorced spouses, and their children, whose health insurance has been provided under the umbrella of an employed spouse's group policy. For these people, death or divorce carries an additional loss, that of their health insurance coverage. These individuals often are ill-equipped to foot the bill for an expensive individual policy—assuming they can even find a policy to cover them.

At least part of the dilemma of the uninsured stems from a national preference for group insuring. Eighty-five percent of health insurance is obtained through the workplace, at group rates. A large percentage of families obtain their health insurance through the principal wage earner's employer. In a system so totally group oriented, it is easy to understand how a spouse's death—or a divorce—can leave a nonemployed person underinsured, at best, and more likely, completely uninsured. Individual health policies are far more difficult to obtain than in times past. When they are available, they almost always provide less coverage at substantially higher rates than the group policies.

The Health Insurance Continuation Act requires group health insurance plans to allow continued access to coverage for spouses and their dependent children who have been previously covered but, due to a change in family status, suddenly find themselves uninsured.

This bill is a modification of H.R. 21, legislation introduced in the House by Representative STARK, and incorporated with changes into the deficit reduction package approved by the Ways and Means Committee (H.R. 3128). While this bill will not help every uninsured individual, it will protect an estimated 5 million Americans.

In response to concerns raised by employers about H.R. 21, I have worked with the Washington Business Group on Health, the National Association of Manufacturers, and other groups to come up with a bill that is more acceptable to employer's. The bill that I am introducing today addresses their major concerns and has the full support of the American Association of Retired Persons, the Older Women's League, along with other national senior citizen and womens' organizations.

Mr. President, the Senate Special Committee on Aging, which I have the honor to chair, held hearings several months ago on the problems of the medically uninsured. Among those testifying at these hearings was an independent insurance broker who frequently encounters situations in which women find themselves without insurance due to changes in family status. She focused on three problem areas: women who lose their medical coverage as a result of the loss of their or their spouse's employment; women who lose coverage as a result of divorce or death of their spouse; and women who are not employed, are 65 or older, but not eligible for medicare, who cannot get coverage through private carriers. She described case after case in which her clients could not get adequate health insurance protection. All too often, these people were left at risk for enormous medical bills. For some of these women, insurance was especially difficult to obtain because of preexisting conditions or the very expensive premiums of individual policies.

Another witness at the committee's hearing told of her own problems in obtaining health coverage after the death of her husband. She thought her husband's policy would continue to protect her. But when she became ill and sent her claims in, she was told that she was no longer covered. Because she had cancer, nobody would insure her. Her medical bills exceed $5,000—all of which she is struggling to pay out of pocket.

In our investigation we found that not only is the lack of health insurance a financial burden, but it may actually be detrimental to health. People are reluctant to seek medical care when they are without insurance. The delay in seeking care can be costly, and even deadly. Moreover, there are an increasing number of hospitals that refuse to provide health care services to those without insurance before receiving some up-front payment, or a guarantee that payment will be forthcoming.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today denies the business tax deduction for group health insurance to all employers who fail to provide the option of 2 years of continuation coverage to the previously covered family members of deceased, divorced, or medicare-eligible workers. After 2 years, the individual will be offered the right to convert to an individual policy with the employer's group insurer.

Notification of eligibility for a continuation option would be made when a policy is issued. This option must be held open for a period of 60 days, with full coverage maintained in the interim. Continuation coverage will not be conditional on any physical examination and will entitle the individuals to the same scope of benefits as similarly situated individuals provided under the group plan at the time of continuation. The insured spouse will pay both the employee and employer shares of the premium directly to the insurer, unless other arrangements are made. Premiums shall not exceed the combined employer/employee premiums assessed for each similarly situated group member.

Some may argue that this bill imposes a weighty financial burden on employers. Not true: continuation policies carry no new costs for an employer. Both the employee and employer expenses for the group coverage pass directly to the divorced spouse or widow. The administrative burden placed on employers to keep track of the newly covered individuals is very minimal.

Mr. President, this legislation offers the perfect opportunity for us to turn back to the private sector some of the responsibility for providing needed health care to Americans. It creates no hardship for employers or for the Federal Government and offers an avenue for assuring full access to health care for minor dependents. It creates a support for those dependents who need it for a period long enough to enable them to regain some stability and a means for self-support. I hope that my colleagues will see the merit of this bill and join me in seeking its passage. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1632

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (i) of section 162 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to deduction for trade or business expenses with respect to group health plans) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (2) as paragraph (3); and

(2) by inserting after paragraph (1) the following new paragraph:

"(2) CONTINUATION COVERAGE.—

"(A) Requiring option of continuation coverage when qualified beneficiary would lose coverage.—The expenses paid or incurred by an employer for a group health plan shall not be allowed as a deduction under this section unless each qualified beneficiary who would lose coverage under the plan because of a qualifying event is given, in accordance with this paragraph, the option of electing continuation coverage under the plan.

"(B) ELECTION.—

"(i) ELECTION PERIOD.—The option of electing continuation coverage must be offered during a period that—

"(I) begins not later than the termination date (as defined in subparagraph (C)(ii)),

"(II) is of at least 60 days duration, and

"(III) ends not earlier than 60 days after the date the qualified beneficiary is notified under subparagraph (F)(iv) or the termination date, whichever date is later.

"(ii) EFFECT OF ELECTION ON OTHER BENEFICIARIES.—Unless otherwise specified in the election, any such election by a qualified beneficiary described in subparagraph (G)(ii)(I) shall be deemed to include an election of continuation coverage on behalf of any other qualified beneficiary whose coverage would, but for continuation coverage provided in accordance with this paragraph, be affected by the qualifying event.

"(C) QUALIFYING EVENT AND TERMINATION DATE.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) A 'qualifying event' under a group health plan, with respect to a covered employee, is any of the following events if coverage of a qualified beneficiary under the plan would, but for continuation coverage provided in compliance with this paragraph, be terminated by the occurrence of the event:

"(I) The death of the covered employee.

"(II) The divorce or separation of the covered employee from the employee's spouse.

"(III) The covered employee becoming entitled to benefits under title XVIII of the Social Security Act.

"(ii) The term 'termination date' means, with respect to a qualifying event, the date on which coverage of a qualified beneficiary under a group health plan would be terminated under the plan but for continuation coverage provided in compliance with this paragraph.

"(D) TERMS OF CONTINUATION COVERAGE.—Any continuation coverage elected by or on behalf of a qualified beneficiary shall meet the following requirements:

"(i) NO REQUIREMENT OF INSURABILITY.—The coverage may not be conditioned upon, or discriminate on the basis of lack of, evidence of insurability.

"(ii) CONTINUED BENEFITS.—The coverage shall consist of coverage which is identical to the coverage provided under the plan to similarly situated beneficiaries under the plan with respect to whom a qualifying event has not occurred.

"(iii) PERIOD OF CONTINUED COVERAGE.—The coverage shall be for a period commencing upon the termination date and ending not earlier than the earliest of the following:

"(I) MAXIMUM OF TWO YEARS.—Two years after the termination date.

"(II) END OF PLAN.—The date on which the employer ceases to provide any group health plan to employees.

"(III) FAILURE TO PAY PREMIUMS.—The date on which there is a failure in making timely payment of any premium required under the plan with respect to the qualified beneficiary

"(IV) REEMPLOYMENT OR MEDICARE ELIGIBILITY.—The date on which the qualified beneficiary first becomes or could become, after the date of the election, a covered employee under any other group health plan or becomes entitled to benefits under title XVIII of the Social Security Act.

"(V) REMARRIAGE OF SPOUSE.—In the case of a qualified beneficiary described in subparagraph (g)(ii)(I), the date on which the beneficiary remarries and becomes (or could become) covered under a group health plan as the spouse of a covered employee.

"(VI) CHILD TURNING MAJORITY.—In the case of an individual who is a qualified beneficiary by reason of having been a covered dependent child of a covered employee, the date on which the individual ceases to be a covered dependent child of the covered employee.

"(iv) CONVERSION OPTION.—In the case of a qualified beneficiary whose period of continued coverage expires under clause (iii)(I), the plan must provide to the beneficiary, during the 180-day period ending on the date of expiration of the period of continued coverage, the option of enrollment under a conversion health plan otherwise generally available to beneficiaries under the plan.

"(E) PREMIUMS FOR CONTINUATION COVERAGE.—

"(i) AMOUNT.—The total premium charged by a group health plan with respect to any qualified beneficiary for continuation coverage under the plan shall not exceed the sum of employer premiums and employee premiums generally charged with respect to coverage under the plan of similarly situated beneficiaries with respect to whom a qualifying event has not occurred. The total of all premiums charged by the plan in any plan year may be based upon reasonably anticipated community costs for such plan year of the entire pool of covered employees and other beneficiaries under the plan, including qualified beneficiaries receiving continuation coverage under the plan under this paragraph.

"(ii) PAYMENTS.—The plan may provide for payment of the total premium by the qualified beneficiary receiving such coverage, or for payment of all or part of such premium by the employer or other party and payment of the remainder of such premium by such beneficiary. The plan shall provide for payment of any premium by a qualified beneficiary in monthly installments if so elected by the beneficiary. If an election is made during an election period but after the termination date, the plan shall permit payment of any premium for continuation coverage during the preceding period to be made within 34 days of the date of the election.

"(iii) PREMIUM DEFINED.—As used in this subparagraph, the term 'premium' means any amount payable with respect to the provision of coverage under a group health plan.

"(F) NOTICE REQUIREMENTS.—In accordance with regulations of the Secretary—

"(i) the group health plan must provide, at the time of commencement of coverage under the plan, for written notice to each covered employee and spouse of the employee (if any) of the rights provided under this paragraph;

"(ii) the employer of an employee under the plan must notify the group health plan administrator if the employee dies;

"(iii) each covered employee is responsible for notifying the group health plan administrator of the occurrence of any qualifying event (other than that described in subparagraph (C)(i)(I)) respecting that employee; and

"(iv) the group health plan administrator must notify each qualified beneficiary, within a period of 14 days after the date the administrator is notified concerning the occurrence of a qualifying event affecting that beneficiary, of—

"(I) the termination date with respect to the beneficiary, and

"(II) the beneficiary's right to elect continuation coverage under this paragraph and the election period established under subparagraph (B)(i) during which the beneficiary can exercise that right.

"(G) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) COVERED EMPLOYEE.—The term 'covered employee' means an individual who is (or was) provided coverage under a group health plan by virtue of the individual's employment or previous employment with an employer.

"(ii) QUALIFIED BENEFICIARY.—The term 'qualified beneficiary' means, with respect to a covered employee under a group health plan, any other individual who, on the date before the date of a qualifying event for that employee—

"(I) is a beneficiary under the plan as the spouse of the employee and has been married to the employee for at least the immediately preceding 30-day period, or

"(II) is a beneficiary under the plan as a covered dependent child of the employee.

"(iii) COVERED DEPENDENT CHILD.—The term 'covered dependent child' means, with respect to a covered employee, an individual who meets the generally applicable requirements of the plan for treatment as a dependent child covered under the plan by reason of the coverage of the employee under the plan.

"(iv) GROUP HEALTH PLAN ADMINISTRATOR.—The term 'group health plan administrator' means, in connection with a group health plan, any person who provides for administrative functions relating to enrollment of individuals under the plan. For purposes of this subparagraph, the term 'person' includes one or more individuals, governments or agencies of the United States or any State or political subdivision thereof, labor unions, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, mutual companies, joint ventures, joint stock companies, societies, trusts, unincorporated organizations, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, receivers, and fiduciaries.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Paragraph (1) of section 162(i) of such Code is amended by striking out "General rule" and inserting in lieu thereof "Coverage relating to end stage renal disease".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) GENERAL RULE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to plan years beginning on or after January 1, 1986.

(2) SPECIAL RULE FOR COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENTS.—In the case of a group health plan maintained pursuant to one or more collective bargaining agreements between employee representatives and one or more employers ratified before the date of the enactment of this Act, the amendments made by this section shall not apply to plan years beginning before the earlier of—

(A) the date on which the last of the collective bargaining agreements relating to the plan terminates (determined without regard to any extension thereof agreed to after the date of the enactment of this Act), or

(B) January 1, 1987.

For purposes of subparagraph (A), any plan amendment made pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement relating to the plan which amends the plan solely to conform to any requirement added by this section shall not be treated as a termination of such collective bargaining agreement.

(d) NOTIFICATION TO COVERED EMPLOYEES.—At the time that the amendments made by this section apply to a group health plan described in section 162(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the plan shall notify each covered employee, and spouse of the employee (if any), who is covered under the plan at that time of the continuation coverage required under paragraph (2) of that section. The notice furnished under this subsection is in lieu of notice that may otherwise be required under paragraph (2)(F)(i) of that section.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 1633. A bill to maintain the current tax on cigarettes on a permanent basis, and to distribute 50 percent of the proceeds of such tax to the States for preventive health programs; to the Committee on Finance.

DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION ACT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today, I rise to introduce the Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Act of 1985. This legislation would maintain the current Federal cigarette tax at 16 cents per pack rather than letting it revert back to 8 cents per pack on October 1, 1985, as currently scheduled. S. 1633 would devote 8 cents of this 16 cents tax per pack to a trust fund to be distributed to the States for disease prevention and health promotion activities.

Mr. President, this bill represents somewhat of a turnabout for me. As you and my colleagues know, ever since I was first elected to the Senate, I have been opposed to increases in Federal excise taxes for cigarettes and alcohol. My sentiments have not changed. However, it appears inevitable that the tax will be increased this year and I put forth this proposal as a statement of where I think the money ought to go.

The momentum to reduce the deficit has driven the increased interest in the Federal cigarette tax. Many times I have argued that we should not try to solve the Government's fiscal problems at the margin by small increases as represented by this cigarette tax. It is not a "flash in the pan" when you consider the full extent of the Federal Government's fiscal problems. But, since my colleagues are so determined to use it, I decided to speak up and develop the alternative in S. 1633 for their consideration.

In the past, I have flatout opposed cigarette taxes for a number of reasons:

First, excise taxes on cigarettes and alcohol have and should remain the province of the States. The Federal Government since 1981 has been reducing its funding for State activities. Commensurately, State responsibilities in education, health, and other areas have increased. The Federal aid, as a percent of State revenues, declined from 31.7 percent in 1980 to 23.7 percent in 1984. By 1986, the ratio will be down to less than 22 percent and per capita figures show comparable declines.

The States, with "tax revolt" not a distant memory, have little "tax room." The public wants to see State sales, income, and property taxes kept down. The excise taxes are one of their only routes for enhancing revenue. Since 1940, the real Federal excise tax burden has fallen. This has provided additional taxing capacity. And, they have taken advantage of it. Between 1981 and 1982, 20 States raised cigarette taxes. This year, 14 States increased their cigarette taxes contingent upon the Federal tax falling back to 8 cents, while 11 States raised their cigarette taxes regardless of congressional action. My home State of Minnesota is in this position.

Second, I have always felt that excise taxes were particularly regressive. They are especially hard on the poor who can least afford the price increase yet tend to smoke more than the well-to-do. One study indicates that 26 percent of men in white-collar jobs now smoke, while 50 percent of their blue-collar counterparts do. Not only do these comparisons hold true for working women, but it appears that the number of blue-collar female smokers is increasing.

I am concerned that there will be cases where the higher costs of cigarettes will actually take food off the table. I realize that the price sensitivity of the poor will reduce the consumption of cigarettes with higher taxes. At the same time it is also true that many will keep on smoking at any cost.

Finally, I am a little wary of using the excise tax to control individual habits and lifestyle. It just seems to me that there have to be more direct and better ways. I support using the economic incentives of raising health insurance premiums for smokers. I introduced S. 357 which would do just that for Medicare part B. Also, I know Blue Cross is beginning to offer discounts to nonsmokers in a number of States, including my own State of Minnesota. Advertising, labeling, and other educational means are also effective and to date underestimated.

Regardless of these reasons, other than the tobacco State Senators, the tobacco industry, and the State legislatures, it is obvious that there is a little interest in letting the 16-cents per-pack excise tax for cigarettes revert back to the 8 cents. Therefore, I am forced to the conclusion that I should sacrifice my principles and offer this proposal.

I am not sanguine about the public health problem smoking represents. Every Surgeon General since 1965 has cited smoking as this Nation's No. 1 health risk. The data indicates without a doubt that cigarettes cause death and sickness. On the average, cigarette smokers lose 5½ minutes of life for each cigarette they smoke.

The statistics on the relation between particular diseases and smoking are devastating. Forty percent of the 565,000 heart disease deaths in this Nation are attributable to smoking. Equally, 5 percent of the 131,000 of the annual lung cancer deaths are due to smoking. The list goes on. Just this year, the increased cigarette smoking by women, over the last decades will make lung cancer the leading cause of cancer deaths among women—surpassing breast cancer.

Besides this personal toll, smoking costs society more than $16 billion added health care costs and $50 billion in lost productivity and earnings.

Accounting for these factors and the inevitability of this tax increase, I propose we put the money where it can best advantage the health and welfare of those, particularly the poor, that we will be taxing the most—in disease prevention and health promotion. This Government currently spends woefully little on protective health. It has $110 billion in sick care treatment and research programs but currently devotes only $1 billion to wellness.

It is time we reassess our priorities. The savings we can reap and the improved quality of life for our citizens will be reflected in additional committment we can make to prevention. The testimony at a hearing I held in the Health Subcommittee of the Finance Committee last June clearly demonstrated that preventive health initiatives are effective, though they have been relatively ignored in the Medicare and Medicaid programs. Placing 8 cents of the cigarette excise tax here will put an additional $1.5 billion into preventive health. It will pay off many fold.

The initiative I propose in S. 1633 would not institute a new 1960's-like catagorical program. Instead, it would give the States the option to supplement existing Federal preventive efforts—the maternal and child health, preventive health, and alcohol, drug abuse, and mental health block grants—or to spend it on own particular preventive priorities. It is my hope that States would choose to devote some of these funds to public health efforts to discourage smoking by the young.

Since the poor will be proportionately paying the most and can benefit the most from preventive health initiatives of State and local government, I have developed for S. 1633 a funding formula which would be based on population and the number of individuals a State has with incomes below the poverty level.

Let me conclude by saying that once this "deficit crunch" is over, I would hope we will allow the States to "buy out" this tax much as I have proposed we do with the gas tax. Though, I suppose, such an alternative will not be feasible for the forseeable future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of S. 1663 and the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1633

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Act of 1985".

TAX ON CIGARETTES

SEC. 2. (a) RATE OF TAX.—Section 283(c) of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 is amended by striking out "and before October 1, 1985".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to cigarettes removed after September 30, 1985.

DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION TRUST FUND

SEC. 3. (a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter A of chapter 98 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to Trust Fund Code) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 9505. DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION TRUST FUND

"(a) CREATION OF TRUST FUND.—There is established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the 'Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Trust Fund', consisting of such amounts as may be appropriated or credited to the Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Trust Fund as provided in this section or section 9602(b).

"(b) TRANSFERS TO DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION TRUST FUND.—There is hereby appropriated to the Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Trust Fund an amount equal to 50 percent of the taxes received in the Treasury after September 30, 1985, under section 5701(b) (relating to tax on cigarettes).

"(c) EXPENDITURES FROM TRUST FUND.—Amounts in the Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Trust Fund shall be available, as provided in appropriation Acts, for grants to States for approved preventive health programs in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(d) GRANTS TO STATES.—

"(1) AMOUNT OF GRANT.—Each State which complies with the requirements of this section for a fiscal year shall receive a grant for such fiscal year in an amount equal to—

"(A) the amount which bears the same ratio to 50 percent of the total amount appropriated for grants under this section for such fiscal year as such State's population bears to the total population of all the States receiving grants under this section for such fiscal year, plus

"(B) the amount which bears the same ratio to 50 percent of the total amount appropriated for grants under this section for such fiscal year as such State's poverty population bears to such State's total population, standardized such that the total amount under this subparagraph equals 50 percent of the total amount appropriated for grants under this section for such fiscal year.

"(2) POVERTY POPULATION.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'poverty population' means those individuals whose family income is below the official poverty line for a family of that size, as established by the Office of Management and Budget.

"(3) STATE.—For purposes of this section, the term 'State' means the 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

"(e) USE OF GRANTS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—A State may use grants received under this section—

"(A) for any purpose for which funds could be used if received under title V of the Social Security Act (Maternal and Child Health Services Block Grant), part A of title XIX of the Public Health Service Act (Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant), or part B of title XIX of the Public Health Service Act (Alcohol and Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services Block Grant); or

"(B) for carrying out a program of preventive health which the Secretary of Health and Human Services has approved, on the basis of the application submitted in accordance with subsection (f), as being within the priorities for preventive health established by the Surgeon General.

"(2) PROHIBITED USES.—No funds received under this section may be used for—

"(A) inpatient services, other than inpatient services provided to crippled children or to high-risk pregnant women and infants, or such other inpatient services as the Secretary of Health and Human Services has approved under section 504(b)(1) of the Social Security Act;

"(B) cash payments to intended recipients of health services;

"(C) the purchase or improvement of land, the purchase, construction, or permanent improvement (other than minor remodeling) of any building or other facility, or the purchase of major medical equipment; or

"(D) satisfying any requirement for the expenditure of non-Federal funds as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds.

"(f) APPLICATION AND STATEMENT OF ASSURANCES.—

"(1) APPLICATION.—In order to receive payment for a fiscal year under this section each State shall submit an application to the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Each such application shall be in such form and submitted by such date as the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall require. Each such application shall contain assurances that the legislature of the State has complied with the provisions of paragraph (2) and that the State will meet the requirements of paragraph (3).

"(2) PUBLIC HEARINGS.—After the expiration of the first fiscal year in which a State receives a payment under this section no funds shall be paid to such State for any fiscal year under this section unless the legislature of the State conducts public hearings on the proposed use and distribution of such funds for such fiscal year.

"(3) ASSURANCES.—As part of the annual application required by paragraph (1), the chief executive officer of the State shall certify that such State—

"(A) agrees to use the funds paid under this section in accordance with the requirements of this section;

"(B) agrees to establish reasonable criteria to evaluate the performance of entities which receive funds from the State from the payment made under this section, and to establish procedures for procedural and substantive independent State review of any failure by the State to provide funds for any such entity;

"(C) agrees to permit and cooperate with any Federal investigation undertaken in accordance with subsection (g);

"(D) has identified those populations, areas, and localities in the State with a need for the services for which funds may be provided by the State under this section; and

"(E) agrees that Federal funds made available under this section for any period will be so used as to supplement and increase the level of State, local, and other non-Federal funds that would in the absence of such Federal funds be made available for the programs and activities for which funds are provided under this section and will in no event supplant such State, local, and other non-Federal funds.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services may not prescribe for a State the manner of compliance with the requirements of this paragraph.

"(4) DESCRIPTION OF INTENDED USE.—

"(A) The chief executive officer of a State shall, as part of the application required by paragraph (1), also prepare and furnish the Secretary of Health and Human Services (in accordance with such form as the Secretary shall provide) with a description of the intended use of the payments the State will receive under this section for the fiscal year for which the application is submitted, including information on the programs and activities to be supported and services to be provided. The description shall be made public within the State in such manner as to facilitate comment from any person, including any Federal or other public agency, during development of the description and after its transmittal. The description shall be revised, consistent with this section, throughout the year as may be necessary to reflect substantial changes in the programs and activities assisted by the State under this section, and any revision shall be subject to the requirements of the preceding sentence.

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), if funds are to be used for purposes allowed under subsection (e)(1)(A), the description need only include the program under which the use of funds is authorized. If funds are to be used for purposes of a program described in subsection (e)(1)(B), the description shall include sufficient information with respect to the program to enable the Secretary of Health and Human Services to determine whether such program is within the priorities for preventive health established by the Surgeon General.

"(g) REPORTS, AUDITS, AND INVESTIGATIONS.—

"(1) ANNUAL REPORTS.—Each State shall prepare and submit to the Secretary of Health and Human Services annual reports on its activities under this section. Such reports shall be in such form and contain such information as the Secretary determines, after consultation with the States and the Comptroller General, to be necessary (A) to determine whether funds were expended in accordance with this section, (B) to secure a description of the activities of the State under this section, and (C) to secure a record of the purposes for which funds were spent, of the recipients of such funds, and of the progress made toward achieving the purposes for which the funds were provided. Copies of the report shall be provided, upon request, to any interested person, including any public agency. In determining the information that States must include in the report required by this paragraph, the Secretary may not establish reporting requirements that are burdensome.

"(2) AUDITS.—Chapter 75 of title 31, United States Code (relating to single audits), shall apply to funds paid to the States under this section.

"(3) INVESTIGATIONS.—

"(A) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct in several States in each fiscal year investigations of the use of funds received by the States under this section in order to evaluate compliance with the requirements of this section and certifications provided under subsection (f).

"(B) The Comptroller General of the United States may conduct investigations of the use of funds received under this section by a State in order to insure compliance with the requirements of this section and certifications provided under subsection (f).

"(C) Each State, and each entity which has received funds from a payment made to a State under this section, shall make appropriate books, documents, papers, and records available to the Secretary or the Comptroller General of the United States, or any of their duly authorized representatives, for examination, copying, or mechanical reproduction on or off the premises of the appropriate entity upon a reasonable request therefor.

"(D) In conducting any investigation in a State, the Secretary or the Comptroller General of the United States may not make a request for any information not readily available to such State or an entity which has received funds from a payment made to the State under this section or make an unreasonable request for information to be complied, collected, or transmitted in any form not readily available. This paragraph does not apply to the collection, complication, or transmittal of data in the course of a judicial proceeding.

"(h) WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS.—(1) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall, after adequate notice and an opportunity for a hearing conducted within the affected State, withhold funds under this section from any State which does not use such funds in accordance with the requirements of this section or the certification provided under subsection (f). The Secretary shall withhold such funds until the Secretary finds that the reason for the withholding has been removed and there is reasonable assurance that it will not recur. The Secretary may not institute proceedings to withhold such funds unless the Secretary has conducted an investigation concerning whether the State has used such funds in accordance with the requirements of this section or the certification provided under subsection (f). Investigations required by this paragraph shall be conducted within the affected State by qualified investigators.

"(2) The Secretary shall respond in an expeditious manner to complaints of a substantial or serious nature that a State has failed to use funds in accordance with the requirements of this section or certifications provided under subsection (f).

"(3) The Secretary may not withhold funds under paragraph (1) from a State for a minor failure to comply with the requirements of this section or certifications provided under subsection (f).

"(i) NONDISCRIMINATION AND CRIMINAL PENALTIES.—The provisions of sections 1908 and 1909 of the Public Health Service Act shall apply with respect to the use of funds paid to States under this section in the same manner as such sections apply with respect to the use of funds allotted to States under part A of title XIX of such Act (Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant).".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for such subchapter A is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"SEC. 9505. DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION TRUST FUND.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall become effective on October 1, 1985.

BILL SUMMARY OF S. 1633—THE DISEASE PREVENTION AND HEALTH PROMOTION ACT OF 1985

Current law: The federal excise tax on cigarettes was set at 16 cents in 1982. This law sunsets on October 1, 1985 when the federal tax would revert back to 8 cents per pack.

S. 1633 will:

1. Retain the 16-cent cigarette tax.
2. Set up a Disease Prevention and Health Promotion Trust Fund to which 50 percent of the 16-cent tax would go.
3. Funds from the Trust Fund would then be distributed to the States to be spent on prevention programs.
4. States would be given the option of using the prevention funds to supplement the current prevention federal block grants (the Maternal Child Health, Preventive Health, and/or Alcohol Drug Abuse and Mental Health Block Grants) or to spend on new preventive health initiatives.
5. Funds will be distributed according to a formula based on each State's population and percent of residents below the poverty level.●

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 1634. A bill to amend the Disaster Relief Act of 1974; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

DISASTER PLANNING GRANTS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, it is also important that after a disaster strikes, there be sufficient plans and resources available to minimize damage and help the victims. I am therefore introducing a bill today which would increase the Disaster Preparedness Improvement Grant from $25,000 to $50,000. This grant provides funds through the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration to each State, on a matching basis, for maintaining and improving disaster plans and procedures. This legislation would also require the Federal Emergency Management Agency to submit a report to Congress at the end of 1 year assessing the adequacy of these funds for the development and maintenance of disaster plans.

The current grant limit of $25,000 has been in effect ever since the passage of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974. Since that time, the consumer price index has risen 110 percent. That level of inflation alone provides a basis for increasing the matching share to $50,000.

More importantly, the current level of funding is not sufficient to enable States to develop adequate disaster plans and procedures. On March 31, 1981, the Comptroller General submitted a report to the Subcommittee on Oversight and Review of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation entitled "States Can be Better Prepared to Respond to Disasters." The report was based on the General Accounting Office's study of seven States' emergency plans, which were developed or updated with Federal funds. The GAO found that a majority of State agencies has not developed standard operating procedures to determine how tasks would be performed in the event of an emergency. This failure exists despite the fact that detailed standard operating procedures have been found crucial to disaster response success. The GAO also found that none of the States had developed training programs to prepare State and local personnel to implement assigned tasks. In addition, in five of the States studied, local communities' emergency plans were not compatible with State plans.

Even though State disaster planning was found to be inadequate 4 years ago, the Federal Government has still not increased the Disaster Preparedness Improvement Grant above its 1974 level.

Samual Speck, the Associate Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency for State and Local Programs and Support, has informed me that FEMA recently suggested to the Office of Management and Budget an increase in these grants from $25,000 to $50,000 because of the need for States to plan adequately for increased State and local funding and operational involvement in disaster response and recovery. Disaster preparedness and response is primarily the responsibility of State and local governments. It is only when an emergency situation is beyond the capability of local and State governments that the President declares a major disaster or an "emergency," thereby providing various types of Federal assistance under the Disaster Relief Act of 1974. However, in order to reduce the long-term burden on the Federal Government and to reduce the damage and loss of life caused by disasters, States need the resources to develop, maintain, and improve their disaster plans and procedures.

The General Accounting Office's report outlining the inadequacy of State planning and the Federal Emergency Management Agency's proposal to double the disaster preparedness improvement grant indicate their belief that States do not at this time have the resources necessary to develop adequate disaster plans. By increasing the Federal Government's grant to States from $25,000 to $50,000, we would be providing States with an incentive to increase their own spending and to develop and improve plans and procedures that are vital to the safety of the American people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1634

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 201(d) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 5131(d)) is amended by striking out "$25,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000".

(b) Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall report to the Congress on the adequacy of State resources to carry out the provisions of section 201(d) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974.

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 1635. A bill to require the Emergency Management Agency to update and distribute the publication entitled "Protecting Mobile Homes from High Winds"; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

MOBILE HOMES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am also introducing legislation that will help prevent the damage and loss of lives caused by natural disasters. Although we must be prepared to respond to and recover from emergencies, the most important action that we can take is to help avert tragedy before it strikes.

I am therefore introducing legislation that would require the Federal Emergency Management Agency to update the out-of-print 1974 pamphlet "Protecting Mobile Homes from High Winds" and to supply this pamphlet, through mobile home manufacturers, to every purchaser of a mobile home in the United States.

Mobile homes can become deathtraps during high wind situations and floods if they are not properly protected. To cite just one example of the gravity of the situation, in 1983 and 1984, 45 percent of all tornado deaths took place among mobile home occupants. Tornadoes are so dangerous to people who live in mobile homes that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration recommends that when a tornado threatens, people should leave mobile homes immediately and head for the nearest shelter. If no shelter is available, even lying flat on the ground is safer than remaining in a mobile home during a tornado.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency believes that the Government's best opportunity to reduce the loss of lives and prevent injuries from tornadoes striking mobile homes is an enhanced public information and education effort targeted at mobile home occupants. FEMA is therefore preparing to reprint the excellent pamphlet "Protecting Mobile Homes from High Winds." This pamphlet includes information about the latest standards for tiedowns and structural strength, as well as improved design and construction performance standards for multipurpose mobile home park shelters.

It is important that all purchasers of mobile homes be informed about the danger they face during high winds and how to best protect themselves and their property. Unfortunately, the current budget only allows for approximately 20,000 pamphlets to be printed. Although any reprinting of this pamphlet after 11 years is certainly important, a far greater number of pamphlets are necessary. Last year, 295,000 mobile homes were purchased in the United States. Every one of these consumers needs to have this vital information. By supplying each mobile home purchaser with this pamphlet, the Federal Government will be taking an important, yet relatively simple step that will aid potential victims of disasters before they strike and thereby reduce the damage and loss of life that they cause.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation I am introducing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.1635

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency shall—

(1) update the publication entitled "Protecting Mobile Homes from High Winds"; and

(2) provide for the distribution of such publication through mobile home dealers to all purchasers of new mobile homes.

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 1636. A bill to increase the maximum individual and family grant under the Disaster Relief Act; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

INDIVIDUAL AND FAMILY GRANTS

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am introducing four pieces of legislation that are vital in order for this Nation to better prepare for and respond to the natural disasters that strike us every year. This legislation is designed to help people who have been hit by tragedy and to increase our preparedness so that tragedy can be averted.

Mr. President, the first piece of legislation that I am introducing today would increase the per-grant limit of the Individual and Family Grant Program from $5,000 to $10,000. This increase is needed in order to better assist the thousands of victims of natural disasters in the United States.

Pennsylvania and Ohio recently experienced a series of tornadoes that left $226 million of damage, thousands of people homeless, and almost 90 dead. I personally toured western Pennsylvania after this disaster and witnessed the horrible toll on the people who must face the loss of their incomes, their farms, their homes, and their loved ones.

Many of these people are eligible for assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Federal aid to individuals comes in many forms, including temporary housing, assistance with mortgage and rental payments, disaster employment assistance, legal services, crisis counseling, and tax relief. In addition, many of the victims of these tornadoes and of other natural disasters are eligible for individual and family grants of up to $5,000 for immediate needs such as clothing, furniture, bedding, and other essentials. However, it is my belief that this $5,000 limit is out of date. It was enacted as part of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974. Since then, the limit would have needed to more than double in order to keep up with inflation. Unfortunately, the $5,000 limit has never been increased and is no longer enough to help many of the victims of natural disasters.

The bill which I am introducing will not affect the majority of grant applicants. The average IFG award in 1984 was $2,300. Thus, the $5,000 limit is adequate for most applicants and an increase would not change their grants at all. However, there are a number of applicants in virtually every disaster who require additional assistance. It is for these devastated victims that we need to increase the individual and family grant limit to $10,000.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1636

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the last sentence of section 408(b) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 5178(b)) is amended by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$10,000".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to disasters occurring on or after May 1, 1985.●

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 1637. A bill to authorize funds for the Department of Commerce for use in the development of the next generation weather radar [NEXRAD]; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

WEATHER RADAR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am also introducing legislation today that will hold the authorization level for the Commerce Department's funding of NEXRAD, next generation weather radar, at its fiscal year 1985 appropriations level of $19.75 million.

NEXRAD represents a major breakthrough in early storm warning. When completed, it will be a nationwide network of weather radar that will satisfy the needs of the Department of Commerce, the Department of Defense, and the Department of Transportation as well as their principal users. The NEXRAD system is designed to meet their needs into the 21st century by providing warnings of hazardous weather, flash flood predictions, general weather forecasts, ensuring safety of flight, water resource management, protecting resources on military installations worldwide, and planning military operations of the Air Force, Army, and Navy.

The NEXRAD system uses Doppler radar technology which is superior to conventional radar and increases leadtime for tornado warnings from 1 minute to an average of 20 minutes. An example if its importance occurred in 1979, during a Joint Doppler Operational Project experiment at Vance Air Force Base. The use of Doppler radar provided enough warning time of an approaching tornado and hailstorm to enable base personnel to protect 52 I-38 aircraft valued at more than $83 million, as well as their own lives. This example demonstrates the enormous potential that the NEXRAD system has to save lives and billions of dollars of property.

The original timetable for NEXRAD development scheduled production to begin in 1988 and continue through 1993. This schedule was based on the assumption that the Commerce Department, which currently supplies 60 percent of the NEXRAD funds, would spend $29.75 million on this program in fiscal year 1986. However, the Office of Management and Budget has recommended cutting fiscal year 1986 funds to $12.86 million. In order for the production of this important system to stay on schedule, a funding level equal to last year's appropriation of $19.75 million is needed.

NEXRAD development should not be delayed. NEXRAD is the only major breakthrough in storm warning visible in the coming years. Even if the current schedule is kept, the program will not be fully operational until 1993. The extra $7 million needed to keep funding at the fiscal year 1985 level rather than OMB's proposed authorization of $12.86 million will ensure that production of this vital system continues according to the original timetable. The money and lives that the NEXRAD system will save will quickly make up for the funds needed to keep it on schedule.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1637

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of enabling the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, Department of Commerce, to carry out its public warning and forecast service duties under law, there is authorized to be appropriated for the next generation weather radar (NEXRAD) development, the sum of $19,750,000.

By Mr. GOLDWATER:

S. 1638. A bill to direct the Secretary of the Interior to release on behalf of the United States certain restrictions in a previous conveyance of land to the town of Jerome, AZ; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

RELEASE OF RESTRICTIONS IN JEROME, AZ, LAND CONVEYANCE

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would allow the town of Jerome, AZ, to use the land it bought from the U.S. Government in 1915 for purposes other than park and cemetery use.

When the 40-acre parcel was purchased, Jerome was a bustling mining town with a population around 15,000. Under the authority of the act of September 30, 1890, which allowed the conveyance of public land for cemetery and park purposes, the town paid fair market value for the area in question. After the closing of the mines in the 1950's, the population decreased markedly so that it now numbers around 500. Less than 10 acres have been utilized and there is little likelihood that the remaining acreage will be needed for expansion of the cemetery.

Jerome would like to have the deed restrictions removed so that it can put the land to its best use and assist the community's economic development. The act of September 30, 1890, contained no express reverter provision and the 1915 land conveyance patent also does not contain an express reversionary clause.

The Department of the Interior has no objection to this proposal as it is written because it does not release the mineral interests of the United States or the right-of-way for ditches and canals contained in the 1915 patent. This is not a controversial bill and is one which I hope will receive timely committee action.●

By Mr. EXON:

S. 1639. A bill to authorize the minting of gold bullion coins; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

GOLD BULLION COIN ACT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased that President Reagan has finally altered his position on South Africa. However, like an overwhelming majority of the Congress, I would like to see the President go further. The anti-apartheid legislation approved by the House of Representatives takes a carrot and a stick approach. It provides for an escape from the imposition of severe sanctions if significant progress in dismantling apartheid is made.

The obvious purpose of both the congressional and Presidential efforts is to symbolically place the United States on the side of democracy in South Africa and to assist democratic forces by taking the profit out of apartheid. The weakness with the President's Executive order is that it does not bring continuing pressure on the South African Government to end its official policies of racial oppression.

One key provision of the anti-apartheid conference report which the President is unable to implement on his own initiative is section 18 of the report which authorizes the minting of American gold coins.

An array of American gold coins in the same sizes, weights, and purities as the South African Krugerrands would provide an American alternative to investment in South Africa. If the President is successful in his ban of the Krugerrand, then there will be at least $400 million in American investment looking for a place to go. It is best that that investment stay in the United States. In addition, American gold coins would enjoy instant acceptance on the world market as a direct competitor to the South African Krugerrand.

On March 7, I introduced the American Gold Bullion Coin Act. A day later Senators CRANSTON and DOLE introduced legislation based on the Lewis-Dixon gold coin bill. During the consideration of the Senate anti-apartheid bill, Senators, CRANSTON, DOLE, and I joined forces to attach legislation based on our gold coin bills to the Senate anti-apartheid bill. That amendment was accepted by the Senate leadership and unanimously adopted as a provision of a noncontroversial amendments package.

In the Anti-Apartheid Act conference, Congressman ANNUNZIO, the congressional expert on American coinage, embraced the Senate concept and added some excellent technical adjustments to improve the gold coin provisions.

The bill I introduce today is the product of the months of work that went into perfecting legislation to authorize the minting of American gold coins. The bill contains the exact provisions of title 18 of the Anti-Apartheid Act. I am hopeful that this legislation can be quickly considered and sent to the President for his signature.

S.J. Res. 197. Joint resolution to designate the week of October 6, 1985, through October 13, 1985, as "National Housing Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HOUSING WEEK

● Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, today, along with 36 of my colleagues, I am introducing a Senate Joint Resolution to proclaim the week of October 6-13, 1985 "National Housing Week."

The housing industry is the single most critical sector of our Nation's economy. I think it is safe to say that America cannot move ahead unless the housing industry is strong, vibrant, and healthy.

Over the past several decades, the housing industry has been a good economic indicator. Five recessions identified by the National Bureau of Economic Research since 1960 were preceeded by downturns in the housing starts and sales while each subsequent recovery was led by a pickup in housing activity.

The general recovery from our most recent experience with an economic downturn was again led by dramatic improvement in housing activity.

In conjunction with playing such a vital role in this Nation's economy, the housing industry has long served as an able partner with the Government in providing safe, decent, and affordable housing for Americans. Therefore, Mr. President, it is only fitting that Congress acknowledge their tremendous contribution to our society as well as their continuing commitment to housing and home ownership in America.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join as a cosponsor of this joint resolution which designates the week of October 6, 1985, through October 13, 1985, as "National Housing Week." My distinguished colleague, Senator HECHT, should be commended for this effort.

Over the past 50 years, the Federal Government has played a major role in advancing national housing policies in its partnership with the housing industry. We must continue to forge the combined commitment of the Federal Government with the strength and ingenuity of private enterprise to bring about decent housing for all Americans.

To own a home and live in decent housing strengthens the family, the community, and the Nation. It gives all Americans a stake in America. The task of providing safe and decent housing, however, requires our continuing commitment to help Americans attain the dream of homeownership. Tax incentives and legislative initiatives to promote home ownership and the availability of affordable housing must continue.

The Federal Government should take an active, advocacy role in housing development and rehabilitation; it should continue policies that help our citizenry fulfill this dream.

National Housing Week serves as a reminder to all Americans that we will not let this dream die. Therefore, it is appropriate, Mr. President, to designate October 6, 1985, through October 13, 1985, as National Housing Week. It reaffirms the national commitment to housing and home ownership, as well as a recognition of the economic opportunities created by housing in our communities.

The promise of a decent shelter has been an enduring dream for all Americans. We cannot let this dream die.●

By Mr. MATHIAS (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S.J. Res. 198. Joint resolution to designate the year of 1986 as the "Sesquicentennial Year of the National Library of Medicine"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SESQUICENTENNIAL YEAR OF THE NATIONAL LIBRARY OF MEDICINE

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution to designate 1986 as the Sesquicentennial Year of the National Library of Medicine, the world's largest and most distinguished collection of health science literature. It is located in Bethesda, MD.

The National Library of Medicine as we know it today began in 1836 as a collection of books in the Office of the Army Surgeon General. As the library grew, it became the Army Medical Library in 1922 and the Armed Forces Medical Library in 1952. The National Library of Medicine [NLM] was officially chartered in 1956 as the result of legislation introduced by Senators Lister Hill and John F. Kennedy.

From its modest origins, the Library has provided impetus to creative innovations in cataloging and documenting medical knowledge for future generations. In 1865, John Shaw Billings, one of our country's greatest bibliographers and librarians, assumed charge of this collection of medical manuscripts. Billings' expertise and unique method of cataloging provided the foundation of the Index Catalogue and Index Medicus, which remains one of the great contributions to medicine.

Among its accomplishments, the NLM has pioneered in developing the renowned Medical Literature Analysis and Retrieval System [MEDLARS]. The Library's computer-based MEDLARS search services are available online to researchers at biomedical libraries and other institutions throughout the world. In research, education, and medical practice, more and more American health professionals are benefiting from these communications systems and services provided by the NLM.

The rapid access to biomedical information that the NLM makes possible has led to significant breakthroughs in the medical field. Many of the contributors to this progress enjoy little recognition or monetary reward. However, their findings, as documented through the efforts of the National Library of Medicine, have improved the health of all Americans.

I urge my colleagues to support this joint resolution and to participate in the commemoration of the Sesquicentennial Year of the National Library of Medicine.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 246

At the request of Mr. DURENBERGER, the names of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] were added as cosponsors of S. 246, a bill for the relief of Peter Lyn Johnson.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 61—CONGRATULATING PETE ROSE ON BECOMING BASEBALL'S ALL-TIME LEADING HITTER

Mr. GLENN (for himself, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. KASTEN) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 61

Whereas Peter Edward Rose has become the all-time leader in base hits in the history of the American pastime, Major League Baseball, by surpassing the record of four thousand one hundred and ninety-one of the great Ty Cobb;

Whereas Pete Rose has played in more winning games than any other player in Major League history;

Whereas Pete Rose won three National League batting titles in 1968, 1969, and 1973;

Whereas Pete Rose was named National League Rookie of the Year in 1963, National League Most Valuable Player in 1973, and the World Series Most Valuable Player in 1975;

Whereas Pete Rose was named the National League Player of the Decade for the period 1970 through 1979 by the "The Sporting News";

Whereas Pete Rose has been named to the National League All-Star Team sixteen times, including ten straight years (1973 through 1982), and has started at five different positions in All-Star games;

Whereas Pete Rose has played in seven National League Championship Series and six World Series; and

Whereas Pete Rose holds all-time Major League records for most games played; for most at-bats; for most singles; for most hits by a switch-hitter; for most total bases by a switch-hitter; for most seasons of two hundred or more hits; for most seasons of one hundred and fifty or more games; and for highest fielding percentage by an outfielder for one thousand or more games: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress to commend Peter Edward Rose on the achievement of becoming the all-time Major League leader in base hits and to recognize all the accomplishments and the inspirational manner in which Pete Rose has played the game of baseball, the National Pastime.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to Peter Edward Rose.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 62—EXPRESSING SOLIDARITY WITH THE SAKHAROV FAMILY

Mr. KERRY (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. HELMS, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. WALLOP, and Mr. HUMPHREY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 62

Whereas, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights guarantees to all the rights of freedom of thought, conscience, religion, opinion and expression;

Whereas, this same Declaration states that "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile;" and that "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondance;"

Whereas, the Declaration further states that "everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State," and that "everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country;"

Whereas, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides that "everyone lawfully within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence," and that "everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own," and that "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country;"

Whereas, the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe provided that each of the "participating states will respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the free of thought (and) conscience . . . for all," and recognized that all human rights "derive from the inherent dignity of the human person;"

Whereas, this same Act pledged that the participating states would "deal in a positive and a humanitarian spirit with the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family, with special attention being given to requests of an urgent character—such as requests submitted by persons who are ill or old;"

Whereas, the Act further commits participating states "to facilitate wider travel by their citizens for personal or professional reasons;"

Whereas, the Act specifically affirms the "right of the individual to know and act upon his rights and duties" under the agreement and affirms the positive role individuals play in the implementation of the Act;

Whereas, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed the Final Act of the Conference on Cooperation and Security in Europe, is a party to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and has ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;

Whereas, Nobel Laureate Andrei Sakharov, who, exercising his right as an individual to monitor compliance with the Final Act, had become a leader of the human rights movement in the Soviet Union, was arrested and exiled to Gorky in direct contravention of the above-mentioned human rights agreements;

Whereas, his wife Elena Bonner, as a result of her efforts to exercise her right of self-expression, has been detained and charged with anti-Soviet agitation;

Whereas, Dr. Bonner is thought to be in urgent need of medical attention available only in the West;

Whereas, Dr. Sakharov is reported to have undertaken a hunger strike, to the point of endangering his health;

Whereas, communication between the Sakharovs in the Soviet Union and their children and stepchildren in the United States has been repeatedly interrupted, delayed, and tampered with by the Soviet authorities;

Whereas, the absence of reliable communications between the branches of the family has created serious doubt as to the state of well-being of Dr. Sakharov and Dr. Bonner;

Whereas, Mr. Alexei Semyonov, the stepson of Dr. Sakharov and the son of Dr. Bonner, has embarked on a hunger strike to dramatize the plight of his family and to protest the cruel obstruction of his efforts to communicate with his loved ones;

Whereas, Mr. Semyonov has demanded a visitor's visa to visit the Soviet Union so that he can reassure himself with his own eyes that his parents are alive and well: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the Sense of the Congress that, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Soviet Union should drop all charges against Dr. Elena Bonner, restore to her and Dr. Andrei Sakharov the full rights to travel (domestic and international) and free expression, allow unimpeded correspondence between them and their relatives and friends in the West, and allow Alexei Semyonov permission to visit them in the Soviet Union.

The Congress urges the President—

(1) to protest, in the strongest possible terms and at the highest levels, the blatant and repeated violations of the Sakharov's rights by the Soviet authorities, and

(2) to call upon all other signatory nations of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to join in such protests.

The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the Ambassador of the Soviet Union to the United States and to the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 63—EXPRESSING APPRECIATION TO PARTICIPANTS IN THE FARMAID CONCERT

Mr. HARKIN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

S. CON. RES. 63

Whereas family farms have played a critical role in the history and development of the United States;

Whereas during the first 6 months of 1985, more than 43,000 mortgages on farms in the United States have been foreclosed;

Whereas over 200,000 jobs have disappeared due to the decline in the farm economy;

Whereas it is paramount that the contribution of agriculture to the United States economy be recognized and protected; and

Whereas the Farmaid Concert will focus national attention on the plight of the American farmer: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the efforts of the organizers of and participants in the Farmaid Concert to be held in Champaign, Illinois, to bring the current crisis in American agriculture to the attention of the American people should be supported.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

IMMIGRATION CONTROL ACT OF 1985

BAUCUS (AND WARNER) AMENDMENT NO. 593

Mr. BAUCUS (for himself and Mr. WARNER) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 1200) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to effectively control unauthorized immigration to the United States, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 5, beginning with line 5, strike out all through the bottom of the page.

On page 2, in the Table of Contents, strike out the item relating to section 102.

HATCH AMENDMENT NO. 594

Mr. HATCH proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 68, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section heading:

SEC. 125. SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 595

Mr. WILSON proposed an amendment to amendment No. 594 proposed by Mr. HATCH to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

In the proposed amendment, strike out all after "SEC. 125." and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

(a) PROVIDING NEW "O" NONIMMIGRANT CLASSIFICATION FOR SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Section 101(a)(15) (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(15)), as amended by this Act, is further amended—

(1) by inserting "and other than seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities described in section 217(h)(1)" in subparagraph (H)(ii) after "section 216(h)(1)";

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (M);

(3) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (N) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(4) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(O) an alien having a residence in a foreign country which he has not intention of abandoning who is coming to the United States to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1)).".

"SEC. 217. ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor, shall by regulation establish a program (hereafter in this section referred to as "the program") for the admission into the United States of seasonal agricultural workers (as defined in section 271(h)(2)).

"(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker (as defined in section 217(h)(2)) may not be approved by the Attorney General unless the petitioner certifies to the Attorney General the following:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYER IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—

"(A) NATURE OF PETITIONER.—The petitioner employs (or contracts for the employment of) individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities, or is an association representing such employers or contractors.

"(B) REQUIREMENTS OF PETITIONS.—For each month concerned and for each agricultural employment region (designated under section 217(i)(1) in which the petitioner is operating, the petition must specify—

"(i) the total number and qualifications of individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities required in each month, and

"(ii) the type of agricultural work required to be performed by these workers.

"(2) WILL MAKE RECRUITING EFFORT.—The petitioner will make a good faith effort to recruit (as required by the Attorney General in regulations) in the area of intended employment, including the listing of employment opportunities with the appropriate office of a governmental employment service, and will accept for employment able, willing, and qualified workers referred by such office to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities until the commencement of the seasonal agricultural services for which the petitioner has recruited.

"(3) REPORT ON RECRUITMENT.—In the case of a petitioner that has employed seasonal agricultural workers during the previous 12 months, the petitioner will provide a summary of his effort to recruit domestic workers to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities during that period.

"(4) ADEQUATE WORKING CONDITIONS.—The petitioner will provide such wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed.

"(5) HOUSING.—The petitioner will furnish housing for nonimmigrants described in section 101(a)(15)(O) or, at the petitioner's option and instead of arranging for suitable housing accomodations, will substitute payment of a reasonable housing allowance to the provider of the housing, but only if the housing is otherwise available within the approximate area of employment.

"(6) NOTICE TO ATTORNEY GENERAL OF EMPLOYMENT.—The petitioner will notify the Attorney General of the entering into, or termination, of an employment relationship with a seasonal agricultural worker not later than 72 hours of the time the relationship is entered into or terminated.

"(7) EMPLOYMENT ONLY IN SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ a seasonal agricultural worker for services other than seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(8) LIMITATION ON THE USE OF "O" WORKERS IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ (or petition for the employment) of a nonimmigrant in any job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(O) for seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities when an application for employment in that job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(N) is pending or approved.

"(9) JOB INFORMATION DISCLOSURE TO "O" WORKERS.—The petitioner shall, upon request, disclose in writing to seasonal agricultural workers when an offer of employment is made, the place of employment, the wage rates, the employee benefits to be provided, and any costs to be charged for each of them, the crops and kinds of activities for which the worker may be employed, and the anticipated period of employment.

"(c) SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION.—The Attorney General shall suspend a petitioner's certification under subsection (b) if any of the following conditions exist:

"(1) LABOR DISPUTE.—There is a strike or lockout in the course of a labor dispute which, under the regulations, precludes such certification.

"(2) VIOLATION OF TERM OF PREVIOUS CERTIFICATIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The employer at any time during the previous two-year period employed seasonal agricultural workers and the Attorney General has determined, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, that the employer at any time during that period—

"(i) substantially violated an essential term or condition of the labor certification under subsection (b) with respect to the employment of domestic or nonimmigrant workers, or

"(ii) has not paid any penalty for such violations which have been assessed by the Attorney General.

"(B) DISQUALIFICATION LIMITED TO ONE YEAR.—No employer may have its certification suspended under clause (A) for more than one year for any violation described in that clause.

"(3) NOT PROVIDING FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION.—The employer has not provided the Attorney General with satisfactory assurances that if the employment for which the certification is sought is not covered by State workers' compensation law, the employer will provide, at no cost to the worker, insurance covering injury and disease arising out of and in the course of the worker's employment which will provide benefits at least equal to those provided under the State workers' compensation law for comparable employment.

"(d) ROLES OF AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—

"(1) PERMITTING FILING BY AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker, and a labor certification with respect to such a worker, may be filed by an association representing seasonal agricultural employers which use agricultural services.

"(2) TREATMENT OF ASSOCIATIONS ACTING AS EMPLOYERS.—If such an association is a joint or sole employer of seasonal agricultural workers, the certifications obtained under this section by the association may be used for the job opportunities of any of its members requiring such workers to perform agricultural services of a seasonal nature for which the certifications were obtained.

"(3) TREATMENT OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) MEMBER'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY ASSOCIATION OR OTHER MEMBERS.—If an individual member of such an association is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the member, the suspension shall apply only to that member and does not apply to the association unless the Attorney General determines that the association or other member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(4) ASSOCIATION'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY MEMBERS.—If an association representing agricultural employers as an agent, joint employer, or employer is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the association, the suspension shall apply only to the association and does not apply to any individual member of the association unless the Attorney General determines that the member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(e) EXPEDITED ADMINISTRATIVE APPEAL OF SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION UNDER SUBSECTION (c)(2)—

"(1) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES.—The Attorney General shall provide for an expedited procedure for the review of a suspension of certification under subsection (c)(2) or, at the applicant's request, for a de novo administrative hearing respecting the suspension. In the case of a request for such a review or hearing, the Attorney General shall provide that the review or hearing take place not later than 72 hours after the time the request is submitted.

"(f) HEARING DE NOVO BEFORE THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT.—

"(1) JURISDICTION.—On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in the District of Columbia, has jurisdiction to enjoin the Attorney General from suspending the complainant's certification under the program and to order the reinstatement of complainant's certification if it is improperly suspeneded. In such a case, the court shall determine the matter de novo and the burden is on the Attorney General to sustain his suspension.

"(2) PRECEDENCE OF CASES.—Except as to cases the court considers of greater importance, proceedings before the district court, as authorized by this and appeals therefrom, take precedence on the docket over all cases and shall be assigned for hearing and trail or for argument at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) AUTHORITY.—The Attorney General is authorized to take such actions, including imposing appropriate penalties and seeking appropriate injunctive relief and specific performance of contractual obligations, as may be necessary to assure employer compliance with terms and conditions of employment under this section.

"(2) APPROPRIATE DOCUMENTATION.—The Attorney General shall provide for such endorsement of entry and exit documents of seasonal agricultural workers as may be necessary to carry out this section and to provide notice for purposes of section 274A.

"(3) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) section 214 and the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law regulating admissibility of nonimmigrant workers.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL SERVICES IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The term 'seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities' means services in agricultural employment including planting cultural practices, production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting involving perishable commodities (as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture).

"(2) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER.—The term 'seasonal agricultural worker' means a nonimmigrant described in section 101(a)(15)(O).

"(3) CARIBBEAN BASIN.—The terms 'Caribbean Basin' and 'Caribbean Basin Countries' include those countries eligible to be designated by the President as 'beneficiary countries' under section 212(b) of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2702(b)).

"(i) ESTABLISHMENT OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS BY AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—For purposes of the administration of the program the Attorney General shall designate not more than 10 agricultural employment regions within the United States. The entire United States shall be encompassed by the area of all such regions.

"(2) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS.—After considering the factors described in paragraph (3), if the Attorney General determines that seasonal agricultural workers are required for a month for an agricultural employment region, the Attorney General shall establish a numerical limitation on the number of nonimmigrant visas that may be issued for such workers for that month for that region.

"(3) FACTORS IN DETERMINATION.—In making the determination and establishing numerical limitations under paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall—

"(A) base the determinations and limitations on petitions filed under section 217(b)(1),

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A), and

"(D) consult with the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(4) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS AFTER THREE YEARS.—The Attorney General shall establish at the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, a numerical limit on the total number of seasonal agricultural workers to be admitted into all employment regions in the United States under the program at any given time. In establishing a numerical limit under this paragraph, the Attorney General shall—

"(A) consider petitions filed under section 217(b)(1) during the preceding years of the program,

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts under taken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A),

"(D) consult with Secretary of Agriculture, and

"(E) consider the recommendation of the Commission on Agricultural Worker Programs on a numerical limit as provided under section 124(c)(5).

"(5) CHANGES IN NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS IN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—

"(A) INADEQUATE MONTHLY AND REGIONAL LIMITATIONS.—if—

"(i) a numerical limitation has been established under paragraphs (2) or (4) for a region for a month, and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes that extraordinary and unusual circumstances have resulted in a significant change in the petitioner's need for seasonal agricultural workers specified in the petition or in the availability of domestic workers who are able, willing, and qualified to perform seasonal agricultural employment, the petitioner may apply to the Attorney General (in such form and manner as the Attorney General shall provide) for an increase in the numerical limitations otherwise established under paragraphs (2) and (4) to accommodate the circumstances.

"(B) DETERMINATION.—The Attorney General shall make a determination on such an application within 72 hours of the date the application is completed. To the extent the application is approved, the Attorney General shall provide for an appropriate increase in the appropriate monthly and regional numerical limitation. The Attorney General may expand the number of workers admitted into the region for which the application is approved by transferring seasonal agricultural workers from another region with a lesser need or by admitting additional workers from foreign countries. In the event the limit on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers for all regions in the United States established under paragraph (4) has been reached at the time the application alleging extraordinary and unusual circumstances is filed, the Attorney General shall follow the procedures in subparagraph (C).

"(C) INCREASE IN THE NUMERICAL LIMITATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers into all employment regions has been established by the Attorney General under paragraph (4) and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes under the provisions of subparagraphs (A) and (B) that extraordinary and unusual circumstances require an increase in the numerical limitation, the Attorney General may provide for an increase in the appropriate numerical limitation in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the total number authorized for admission into all regions. Any such increase authorized by the Attorney General shall terminate upon the end of circumstances requiring it and shall not result in a permanent expansion of the numerical limit established the Attorney General under paragraph (4).

"(j) ENTRY OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—

"(1) ANNUAL TIME LIMITATION.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker under section 101(a)(15)(O) for a period of more than nine months in any calendar year. An alien admitted under section 101(a)(15)(O) during any calendar year will not be eligible for readmission into the United States until he has returned to his country of origin for a period of 3 months.

"(2) VIOLATORS DISQUALIFIED FOR 5 YEARS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker if the alien was admitted to the United States as such a worker within the previous five-year period and the alien during that period violated a term or condition of such previous admission.

"(k) WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of Agriculture and Labor, shall establish through regulation appropriate wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed in the area of intended employment.

"(l) ALLOCATION AND USE OF VISAS UNDER THE PROGRAM.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Nonimmigrant visas for seasonal agricultural workers, within the numerical limitations established under subsection (i)(2), shall be made available as follows:

"(A) PREVIOUS WORKERS.—Visas shall first be made available to qualified nonimmigrants who have previously been admitted as seasonal agricultural workers and who have fully complied with the terms and conditions of any such previous admission, providing priority in consideration among such aliens in the order of the length of time in which they were so employed.

"(B) OTHERS.—Any remaining visas shall be made available to other qualified nonimmigrants.

"(C) TREATMENT OF SPOUSES AND CHILDREN.—A spouse or child of a seasonal agricultural worker is not entitled to a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker by virtue of such relationship, whether or not accompanying or following to join the nonimmigrant, but may be provided a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker if the spouse or child also is a qualified as such a worker.

"(D) NO INDIVIDUAL EMPLOYER VISA PETITION REQUIRED.—An alien admitted pursuant to section 101(a)(15)(O) shall not be required to obtain any petition from any prospective employer within the United States in order to obtain a nonimmigrant visa under the program.

"(E) NO LIMITATION TO PARTICULAR EMPLOYER OR CROP.—A nonimmigrant visa issued under the program shall not limit the geographical area (other than by agricultural employment region) within which a seasonal agricultural worker may be employed or limit the type of seasonal agricultural employment services, in perishable commodities, the worker may perform.

"(F) DISQUALIFICATION FROM FEDERAL ASSISTANCE.—A seasonal agricultural worker under the program is not eligible for any program of financial assistance under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government.

"(G) ALLOCATION OF VISAS TO CARIBBEAN BASIN COUNTRIES.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Agriculture, shall establish through regulations the allocation of visas to workers in specific countries under this section. A percentage of the visas issued shall be allocated to qualified workers in countries located in the Caribbean Basin.

"(m) TRUST FUND FOR PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Attorney General shall establish by regulation a trust fund the purpose of which is to provide funds for the administration of the program and to provide a monetary incentive for seasonal agricultural workers in the program to return to their country of origin upon expiration of their visas under the program. The Attorney General shall promulgate such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(2) PAYMENTS INTO TRUST FUND.—In the case of employment of a seasonal agricultural worker under the program—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENT.—The employer shall provide for payment into the trust fund established under this subsection of an amount equivalent to 11 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENT.—There shall be deducted from the wages of the nonimmigrant and paid into such trust fund an amount equivalent to 20 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(C) WAGES DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'wages' has the meaning given such term in section 3121(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, except that for these purposes paragraph (1) of that section shall not apply.

"(3) USE OF AMOUNTS IN TRUST FUND.—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENTS AND INTEREST.—Except as provided in paragraph (B), amounts paid into the trust fund, and interest thereon, shall be used for the purpose of administering the program.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENTS.—Amounts described in paragraph (B) paid into the trust fund with respect to a worker and interest thereon shall be paid to the worker if—

"(i) the worker applies for payment within 30 days of the last day of employment under the program (as verified by the Attorney General) at the United States consulate nearest the worker's residence in the country of origin, and

"(ii) the worker complies with the terms and conditions of the program including the obligation to be continuously employed (or actively seeking employment) in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(4) EXPANSION OF CONSULATES.—The Secretary of State is authorized to take such steps as may be necessary in order to expand and establish consulates in foreign countries in which aliens are likely to apply for nonimmigrant status under the program.".

"(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101), as amended by sections 101(b) and 102(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(d) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF LABOR.—(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Labor for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, $10,000,000 for the purposes—

"(A) of recruiting domestic workers for temporary services which might otherwise be performed by seasonal agricultural workers described in section 217, and

"(B) of monitoring terms and conditions under which such temporary and seasonal agricultural workers (and domestic workers employed by the same employers) are employed in the United States.

"(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.—There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the Secretary's duties and responsibilities under section 217.".

"(d) PROHIBITING ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—(1) Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)), as amended by sections 113(a) and 122(e)(1) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) An alien (other than an immediate relative specified in section 210(b)) who entered the United States classified as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(O).

(2) Section 248(1) (8 U.S.C. 1258(1)), as amended by section 122(e)(2), is further amended by striking out "(K) or (N)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(K), (N), or (O).".

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of this section apply to petitions and applications filed under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act on or after the first day of the twelfth month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act (hereafter in this section referred to as the "effective date").

(f) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall approve all regulations to be issued implementing sections 101(a)(15)(O) and 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, final regulations to implement such sections shall first be issued, on an interim or other basis, not later than the effective date.

(g) DEPORTATION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS FOR FAILURE TO BE EMPLOYED OR SEEK EMPLOYMENT.—Section 241(a) (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (19) and inserting in lieu thereof "or"; and

(2) by adding at the end of the following new paragraph:

"(20) entered the United States as nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(O) and failed to be continuously employed or actively seeking employment in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1) in accordance with the usual and customary employment patterns and practices.".

(h) SENSE OF CONGRESS RESPECTING ADVISORY COMMISSION.—It is the sense of Congress that the President should establish an advisory commission which shall consult with the Government of Mexico and the governments of other appropriate countries and advise the Attorney General regarding the operation of the seasonal agricultural worker program established under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(I) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 216, as added by section 122(h), the following new item:

"Sec. 217. Seasonal agricultural worker program.".

CHILES AMENDMENT NO. 596

Mr. CHILES proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 75, line 8 strike "December 31, 1980" and insert in lieu thereof "October 14, 1981".

On page 76, line 8 strike "January 1, 1981" and insert in lieu thereof "October 15, 1981".

On page 76, line 10 strike "December 31, 1980" and insert in lieu thereof "October 14, 1981".

Beginning on page 76 with line 11 strike out all through line 25 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(ii) a national of Haiti who has established a record with the Immigration and Naturalization Service before October 15, 1981, and who was physically present in the United States on that date; or

On page 77, line 1 strike "(iv)" and insert in lieu thereof "(iii)".

(AND KERRY

KERRY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 597

Mr. KERRY (for himself, Mr. HART, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. SIMON, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, and Mr. HARKIN) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 125, after line 23, add the following new title:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. DELAY OF ANTI-SATELLITE WEAPON TEST.

(a) CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the President of the United States and the head of the Soviet Union have agreed to a summit conference scheduled to convene in Geneva, Switzerland, on November 19, 1985;

(2) that conference will present an extraordinary opportunity for an agreement in principle on measures to control the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union, including limitations on anti-satellite weapons; and

(3) a delay in the scheduled test of an anti-satellite weapon against an object in space by the United States until after the conclusion of the summit conference could greatly enhance the climate for fruitful discussions and facilitate the possibility for an accord on anti-satellite weapons.

(b) DELAY OF TEST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense may not carry out a test of the Space Defense System (anti-satellite weapon) against an object in space until after the conclusion of the summit conference between the President of the United States and the head of the Soviet Union referred to in subsection (a).

HAWKINS AMENDMENT NO. 598

Mrs. HAWKINS proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill add the following:

SEC. . There are authorized to be appropriated to an immigration emergency revolving fund, to be established in the Treasury, $35,000,000 to be used to provide for an increase in border patrol or other enforcement activities of the Service and for reimbursement of State and localities in providing assistance as requested by the Attorney General in meeting an immigration emergency, except that no amounts may be withdrawn from such funds with respect to an emergency unless the President has determined that the immigration emergency exists and has certified such fact to the Judiciary Committees of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

McCLURE (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 599

Mr. McCLURE (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. GARN, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. DENTON, Mr. MATTINGLY, and Mr. WILSON) proposed an amendment, which was subsequently modified, to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 125, after line 23, add the following:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. POLICY TOWARD THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States had been and will continue to be enriched by the contributions of immigrants from diverse cultures;

(2) a common language, English, fosters harmony among our people, promotes political stability, permits the interchange of ideas, encourages societal accord, and unites us as a people committed to freedom and equality;

(3) the learning of the English language by our Nation's immigrants is vital to their participation in the economic, education, social, and political opportunities of our country; and

(4) a role of the Congress is supporting the bonds that unite our people, one of the most important of which is the use of the English language.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the English language is the official language of the United States.

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 601. Policy toward the English language.

HAWKINS AMENDMENT NO. 600

Mrs. HAWKINS proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

At the end of title III add the following:

SEC. . VERIFICATION OF IMMIGRATION STATUS OF ALIENS APPLYING FOR BENEFITS UNDER CERTAIN PROGRAMS.

(a) REQUIRING IMMIGRATION STATUS VERIFICATION.—

(1) UNDER AFDC, MEDICAID, UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION, AND FOOD STAMP PROGRAMS.—Section 1137 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320b-7) is amended—

(A) by redesignating paragraphs (4) through (7) of subsection (a) as paragraphs (5) through (8), respectively, and inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) the State shall require, as a condition of eligibility for benefits under any program listed in subsection (b), that each applicant for or recipient of benefits under that program must declare in writing, under penalty of perjury, whether or not the individual is a citizen of the United States, and, if not a citizen of the United States, the individual shall present alien registration documentation or other proof of immigration registration from the Immigration and Naturalization Service that contain the individual's alien admission number, or alien file number (or numbers if he has more than one number), and—

"(A) if such an applicant or recipient is not a citizen of the United States, the State shall utilize the individual's alien file or alien admission number to verify with the Immigration and Naturalization Service the alien's immigration status through an automated or other system (designated by the Service for use with States) that—

"(i) utilizes the alien's name, file number, admission number or other means permitting efficient verification, and

"(ii) protects the alien's privacy to the maximum degree possible,

"(B) if the verification under subparagraph (A) does not indicate that the individual is in an immigration status permitting eligibility for benefits under the applicable program—

"(i) the State shall provide the alien with an opportunity to prove otherwise by submitting to the State documents establishing a satisfactory immigration status for the applicable program, photostatic or other similar copies of which documents shall be transmitted by the State to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for official verification, and

"(ii) the State may not deny, reduce, or terminate an individual's benefits under the program on the basis of immigration status without affording the individual the opportunity described in clause (i), and

"(C) if an individual has been determined (after the opportunity described in subparagraph (B)(i)) to be an alien in an immigration status which does not permit the individual to be eligible for benefits under the applicable program, the State shall deny or terminate the individuals's participation in the program;"; and

(B) in subsection (b), by striking out "income verification system" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu "income and eligibility verification system".

(2) UNDER SSI PROGRAM.—Section 1631(e)(1)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "subsections (a)(6) and (c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a)(4), (a)(7), and (c)".

(b) PROVIDING 90 PERCENT MATCHING FUNDS FOR NON-LABOR COSTS OF IMPLEMENTATION AND OPERATION.—

(1) UNDER AFDC PROGRAM.—Section 403(a)(3) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting before subparagraph (B) the following new subparagraph:

"(A) 90 percent of so much of such expenditures as are for the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4),".

(2) UNDER MEDICAID PROGRAM.—Section 1903(a) of such Act is amended by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) an amount equal to 90 percent of the sums expended during the quarter which are attributable to the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4); plus".

(3) UNDER UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION PROGRAM.—The first sentence of section 302(a) of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end the following: ", including 90 percent of so much of the reasonable expenditures of the State as are attributable to the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4)".

(4) UNDER CERTAIN TERRITORIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.—Sections 3(a)(4), 1003(a)(3), 1403(a)(3), 1603(a)(4) of the Social Security Act (as in effect without regard to section 301 of the Social Security Amendments of 1972) are each amended by redesignating subparagraph (B) as subparagraph (C) and inserting after subparagraph (A) the following new subparagraph:

"(B) 90 percent of so much of such expenditures as are for the non-labor costs of the implementation and operation of the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4); plus".

(5) UNDER THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM.—Section 16 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2025) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(h) The Secretary is authorized to pay to each State agency an amount equal to 90 per centum of the non-labor costs incurred by the State agency in implementing and operating the immigration status verification system described in section 1137(a)(4) of the Social Security Act.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) INS ESTABLISHING VERIFICATION SYSTEM BY OCTOBER 1, 1987.—The Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization shall implement a system for the verification of immigration status under section 1137(a)(4)(A) of the Social Security Act (as amended by this section) so that the system is available to all the States by not later than October 1, 1987.

(2) HIGHER MATCHING EFFECTIVE IN FISCAL YEAR 1988.—The amendments made by subsection (b) take effect on October 1, 1987.

(3) USE OF VERIFICATION SYSTEM REQUIRED IN FISCAL YEAR 1989.—The amendments made by subsection (a) take effect on October 1, 1988. States have until that date to begin complying with the requirements imposed by those amendments.

PRESSLER (AND WARNER) AMENDMENT NO. 601

Mr. PRESSLER (for himself and Mr. WARNER) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 113, insert the following immediately before line 20:

(f) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that the visa waiver pilot program authorized by the amendments made by this section will provide economic benefits, greater international understanding and cooperation, and more efficient use of consular resources, and that such goals are highly desirable and in the national interest. The Senate reaffirms its support for such program.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Intelligence be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 12, 1985, in closed executive session in order to receive a briefing on intelligence matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Development of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 12, to hold an oversight hearing on Department of Energy's "Mission Plan for the Civilian Radioactive Waste Management Program."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE ORGANIZATION TASK FORCE

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the DOD Organization Task Force of the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet in executive session, during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 12, to hold a meeting to discuss one of the chapters of the DOD Organization Staff Study.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, ARTS, AND HUMANITIES

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 12, 1985, in order to conduct a hearing on the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate, on Thursday, September 12, 1985, between the hours of 3 p.m. and 4 p.m. in order to mark up S. 616, the farm bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

UTERO INTERVENTION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on July 1, a hearing was held under the auspices of the newly-formed Pro-Life Action Task Force for Women, Children and the Unborn. The hearing investigated the most recent developments in fetal diagnosis and fetal surgery, and explored some of the ethical questions surrounding the new technologies.

Women and their children, both born and unborn, are continually faced with distressing circumstances, seemingly beyond their control and without resolution. This hearing is one of several that will examine the positive responses that are in fact available to these women. The testimony resulting from these investigations is being disseminated to State legislatures, the press and the public in an effort to inform them of the potentials and the drawbacks of in utero intervention. It is also our hope to focus public awarenness on the congenital conditions most easily remedied by fetal surgery—namely hydrocephalus and hydronephrosis.

We encourage the use of the hearing transcripts as pools of information from which future legislative and private initiatives can draw. These sources, we hope, will promote much-needed funding for research, provide moral and financial aid to families, and establish ethical guidelines for those involved in and affected by fetal surgery.

In utero intervention is still at an experimental stage. Yet steadily, the field has developed in conjunction with advances in diagnostic techniques, antilabor induction drugs, and fetology. Unique opportunities for aggressive, effective treatment of certain conditions now present themselves—as early as the 18th week of pregnancy.

Over 30 major developmental irregularities can now be detected by prenatal diagnostic tests. Of these, four conditions have been successfully corrected by fetal surgery on human patients, and several more have been remedied in animal patients. Results of the surgery have been striking. Rough estimates show that up to 80 percent of the hydrocephalic patients survive where previously death was imminent. Some of these require further postnatal treatment, but the surgery has served the important function of limiting brain damage. In addition, there are the inspiring cases like Sarah Lund's, where a complete cure seems to have been effected.

Currently, on the basis of the diagnostic information provided, women either abort the "defective" infant or opt to continue the pregnancy and commence appropriate postnatal treatment. The advent of new prenatal options may soon present a positive, middle-ground alternative to the two extremes of abortion and nontreatment. We must address and promote positive alternatives to abortion and suffering such as these if we truly are to become a healthy and caring nation.

Mr. President, I present to my colleagues the written testimony of Dr. Richard Depp, the noted fetal surgeon who has successfully operated in utero on a number of preborn infants. His testimony is especially enlightening about the techniques he uses and the ethical situations he faces. I also present a summary of the hearing.

The material follows:

TESTIMONY OF DR. RICHARD DEPP BEFORE THE "PRO-LIFE ACTION TASK FORCE FOR WOMEN, CHILDREN AND THE UNBORN" HEARING ON FETAL SURGERY

Good afternoon. I am Dr. Richard Depp, Professor of Obstetrics and Gynecology at Northwestern University Medical School and Director of the Division of Obstetrics at Prentice Women's Hospital in Chicago. I have been asked to apprise your Task Force on recent advances in fetal medicine, with particular reference to the technologies of fetal surgery. I have with me Julie Lunde and her daughter Sarah, who presented to my office with a diagnosis of fetal hydrocephalus.

The concept that the fetus is a patient, an individual whose medical or surgical problems are subject to medical or surgical treatment is certainly modern. This is primarily a function of recent availability of techniques allowing the physician to visualize, monitor, measure, and even recently assess responses to outside stimuli. As a consequence, we are now in a position where we must view the fetus seriously from a medical, legal and ethical standpoint as a patient.

Much of our progress over the past years had its foundation in the 1960's and 70's when a number of investigators began experimentation on the animal fetus in attempts to understand fetal physiology and in attempts to create animal models for human disease.

Our ability to potentially treat the fetus as a patient is the result, in many cases, of funding by national health agencies and foundations with interest in this area. Our instruments to assess fetal condition include recent availability of electronic fetal monitors, ability to withdraw amniotic fluid bathing the fetus, through the maternal abdomen to determine the presence of abnormal metabolites or chromosomes, or to measure fetal hormones in the maternal blood or urine. The development that has had the most profound effect on our approach to the fetus was the introduction of safe, non-invasive imaging techniques, such as real-time ultrasound which permits direct visualization of the living fetus. Using this technology, we can accurately delineate normal and abnormal fetal development with truly astounding detail. For those of you who have not visualized such an examination, it is much akin to a moving picture evaluation of the fetus.

We are only now beginning to attempt fetal surgery; the idea is only relatively new. In the 1960's, several investigators from Australia as well as the United States "surgically" treated the fetus with erhythroblastosis fetalis, a condition in which the fetus becomes severely anemic as a result of antibodies crossing from the maternal system. In the early 1960's, Liley demonstrated that intra-abdominal placement of blood in the fetus is effective in treating this condition, severe fetal hydrops. This inaugurated fetal "intervention". Not only are we able to treat the fetus surgically, but we are also able to treat the fetus from a medical vantage point. The most notable medical example is our ability to hasten lung development of the premature fetus by the administration of steroids to reduce the impact of respiratory distress syndrome, an entity which was responsible for the death of former President John F. Kennedy's child. Other conditions include fetal congenital hypothyroidism, another notable example.

With these new abilities comes additional responsibility on the part of the physician. Until recently, the fetus did not require a physician; the only requirement was an advocate or protector. Advocates have always been present but the grounds for advocacy were often religious, emotional and philosophical rather than diagnostic and therapeutic. The fact that correctable disorders can now be recognized, and in some cases managed by medical and surgical therapy, to some extent changes our priorities. It certainly raises complex ethical questions about risks and benefits, and about the rights of the mother and fetus as patients. We as physicians are only beginning to address these difficult issues.

In approaching the fetus with a potentially surgically correctable anomaly, a number of questions are raised. Until recently, the only question raised by the prenatal diagnosis of a fetal malformation, particularly those incompatible with life, was whether to abort the fetus or await delivery. With the advent of new technologies, therapeutic alternatives and prenatal diagnosis, such as changing the mode of delivery and even treatment before birth, assume new clinical significance.

Until recently, the rationale for determining how the prenatal diagnosis of any given fetal defect will affect perinatal management is quite simple. Lesions incompatible with postnatal life lead to spontaneous abortion or delivery. Most surgically correctable lesions are best treated after normal term delivery. It is the lesion which is progressive which leads to reversible or preventable disfunction of other organ systems which requires either early delivery or consideration of fetal surgery. I must emphasize at this point that, although the rationale for such surgical intervention is simple, our present experience, even though dramatically advanced over previous years, is still limited and therefore our views must be cautiously expressed. At this time, they are intended to serve only as a basis for discussion, investigation and refinement.

At the present time, three conditions are considered for possible surgical intervention prior to delivery. They are: posterior urethral valve syndrome, a condition primarily affecting the male fetus resulting in an obstruction of urine release from the penis. The result of this obstruction is progressive enlargement of the bladder and kidney collecting system. There is a secondary failure of fetal lung development because of the dramatic enlargement and expansion of the fetal bladder. The second condition commonly considered is obstructive progressive fetal hydrocephalus, a condition in which the ventricle, a fluid-filled space within the fetal head, enlarges progressively at the expense of brain tissue. A third condition, fetal diaphragmatic hernia, a condition wherein the abdominal contents spill into the fetal chest reducing the ability of the fetal lungs to develop and expand, has also been considered as a problem potentially treated surgically. This latter condition has, to my knowledge, not been treated in the human fetus as of this time.

There are several major points to be made regarding availability of fetal surgery. The first is that fetal surgery is, at this point, experimental with no proven benefit. We have much to learn. However, this should not make us hesitant to proceed with further investigation in this area. The long term objective is to provide the patient and the fetus with alternatives not presently available.

SUMMARY OF FETAL SURGERY HEARING

A hearing examining the relatively new medical field of fetal diagnosis and fetal surgery convened Wednesday, July 31 on Capitol Hill under the auspices of the recently formed Pro-Life Action Task Force For Women, Children and the Unborn. Chaired by Senator Gordon J. Humphrey (R-N.H.), the seven-Senator Task Force has formed to probe issues affecting women and their children—both born and pre-born.

Women and their children today face numerous distressing circumstances beyond their control and seemingly without resolution. The hearing was the first of several that will examine the positive responses to these circumstances that are in fact available. Directed at informing legislators, the press and the public of the potentials and drawbacks of in utero treatments, Senator Humphrey expects the hearing and resulting transcripts to serve as pools of information from which future legislation and private initiatives can draw. Senator Humphrey also noted that the hearing would ultimately demonstrate the importance of in utero operations as a positive alternative to the undesirable extremes of abortion and non-treatment.

One-year old Sarah Lund provided a striking example of the tremendous potential of fetal surgery. Early in 1984, Chicago perinatologists diagnosed Sarah, then only six months in her mother's womb, as suffering an advanced case of congenital hydrocephalus—or "water on the brain." The condition is characterized by a buildup of cerebrospinal fluid as a result of a block in canals exiting the brain. Prevented from reabsorbing into the blood stream, the fluid accumulates in the brain ventricles, compressing normal cells. The excess accumulation leads finally to mental retardation or death.

Sarah's own prognosis was bleak, given her abnormally bloated head—80 percent of which was filled with cerebrospinal fluid. Her condition confirmed by ultrasound, Dr. Richard Depp of Prentice Women's Hospital performed the surgery. When Sarah's skull later enclosed the shunt, Depp implanted a second. The shunt continues to drain the fluid into her abdomen through a tube lying just under her skin.

Sarah's hydrocephalus remains—doctors today know of no cure for the condition—and she will always require periodic revisions of the shunt system. But the operation is a tremendous success in that doctors averted much of the damage that might have occurred, and arrested many of the typical difficulties associated with hydrocephalus. Today, according to her mother, Mrs. Lund, Sarah "has a little bit of trouble with control of her head, but she is rolling over and smiling, and she is very alert. We just think the world is hers."

Surprisingly, and rather refreshingly, Mrs. Lund brushed off concerns about the dangers to her own health. Her fears, she noted, were exclusively for her child. "I wasn't thinking about myself at that time . . . (the pain) was all internal. I really turned into myself, you know, for the baby." Instead, Mrs. Lund's concerns centered on the risk to the life of her child—should the surgeon miss his target or should she (Mrs. Lund) spontaneously abort—and on whether the surgery would actually improve Sarah's condition.

In actual fact, the mother can expect to experience little long-term risk due to the operation. Mrs. Lund, however, described the temporary inconveniences of the surgery, including the nausea associated with anesthesia, the pain of the incision and needle, uterine contractions, and the thrashing of the now agitated baby. Nevertheless, the following morning Mrs. Lund returned home to await Sarah's birth ten weeks later.

Mrs. Lund, responding to Senator Humphrey's observations on the comparative newness of the technology and the lack of experience doctors have in the field, also emphasized that she and her husband were lucky to even discover that in utero options were available. Mrs. Lund also noted the difficulties involved in connecting with knowledgeable sources. As Senator Humphrey noted, Mrs. Lund attributed these difficulties to the lack of information available to doctors, the lack of surgeons with the requisite skills and the shortage of financial resources for research and patient support.

Sarah's doctor, Dr. Depp, in fact, is one of only a handful of fetal surgeons practicing in the relatively new field of fetal surgery. Doctors first intervened in utero in 1963 with transfusions to correct RH imbalances that subjected fetal red cells to attacks by the mother's immune system. Actual surgical intervention did not occur, however, until 1978 when a Harvard team of doctors surgically aspirated the hydrocephalic brain of a fetus. The surgery failed. Research continued, though, and in 1981, doctors in Denver, San Francisco and Richmond all performed successful operations for hydrocephalus, hydronephrosis and collapsed lungs respectively.

New techniques and technology facilitated the development of both fetal diagnosis and fetal surgery. Senator Humphrey noted the importance of the introduction of ritodrin, an anti-labor induction drug. As the primary complication involved in fetal surgery is spontaneous abortion of the fetus, the new drug alone has allowed tremendous advances in the field.

Depp also noted the importance of improved diagnostic methods that visualize and monitor the fetus, and even assess fetal neurological functions. The most profound development, by general consensus of doctors, is that of ultrasound, which enables delineation of fetal conditions with "truly astounding detail." Depp specifically cited new equipment with which "you can actually see the nasal hair on the nostrils of the fetus at twelve or thirteen weeks of pregnancy."

Dr. William Colliton, past Chairman of the OB-GYN department at Holy Cross Hospital, and Assistant Clinical Professor at George Washington University, elaborated upon the "astounding detail" available to the sonographer. An experienced sonograph user in his private practice, Colliton narrated a sector-scan film that showed the beating four-chamber structure of the heart (and the aorta pulsating in unison), vena cava, umbilical vein and cord, liver, eye orbits, nose, mouth, spinal column and ribs of a "twenty-eight weeker." These organs and structures, and others, a sonographer can detect and monitor in infants as young as twelve weeks.

Colliton's descriptions underscored the importance Depp attributes to the sonographer, and the complexity of the ultrasound technician's task. The fetal surgeon relies heavily on the "image" provided by the sonograph to visualize his patient and the target organ. Indeed, the very vitality and responsiveness to pain that characterize (indeed, humanize) the fetus in utero, render the sonographers' role critical and extremely difficult.

These revolutionary technologies have aided in the treatment of three conditions, in addition to the Rh factor imbalance. The first is hydrocephalus—the condition suffered by Sarah Lund. The second is hydronephrosis, an obstruction causing urine buildup in the bladder and kidney, resulting in damaged kidneys and underdeveloped lungs. The third is fetal diaphragmatic hernia, where the abdominal contents push through a lesion in the diaphragm again inhibiting lung growth. Doctors have successfully treated this in animals, and it will most likely be the next operable condition. Depp also expressed optimism that mylomeningecele—the spinal sac condition often associated with spina bifida—will soon be operable.

Depp noted that despite the advances in the technology, fetal patients must meet certain criteria before he will intervene surgically. As Depp described, the infant's conditions must be detectible by available diagnostic tools such as sonography or amniocentesis. The condition must also be progressive, and as a result the prognosis for the child must be expected to worsen substantially if he/she does not receive aid. In addition, the condition must be operable. Any infant with a condition that has little or no chance of being remedied will not be operated on in utero. Finally, Depp refuses to operate on a patient who would benefit from post-natal treatment and yet suffer no significant risks due to a delay in such surgery.

Depp also discussed complications surrounding fetal surgery. Late diagnosis of the condition clearly will complicate the task of the surgeon. The fetus, of course, has no symptoms that are manifest exteriorly, so a mother rarely senses danger signals. That ultrasound is not readily available to many women further contributes to the frequency of late diagnoses. Misdiagnosis and incomplete diagnosis also obviously present problems and this too is exacerbated by the paucity of experienced and capable fetal surgeons and the shortage of funds.

Finally, there is the uncertainty that the surgery in fact, and alone, corrected the condition at hand. To this end an International Fetal Surgery Registry has been established under the direction of Edward Manning of the University of Manitoba—Winnepeg. Following a Krol Foundation Symposium on fetal surgery, the nation's most respected fetal surgeons committed themselves to pooling their information, experience and expertise in the Registry. The surgeons hope in this way to develop a substantial data base upon which scientific determinations can be made.

With the mind-boggling advances in technology come equally perplexing ethical questions. Depp, agreeing with Senator Humphrey that serious problems might result with respect to a fetal candidate selection process, cited concerns regarding the criteria for determining which infants are operable. Depp noted that the analysis of risks and benefits, and subsequent actions in response to this data, also pose critical moral questions. In addition, one must consider the rights of the mother who does not directly benefit from the operation, yet clearly retains status as a patient. Senator Humphrey later pointed out the practical difficulties, in addition to the ethical concerns, involved in compelling a mother unwilling to undergo surgery for the benefit of her infant.

The most significant question raised, however, involves the moral and legal status of the fetus—and Senator Humphrey directed much of the testimony toward this issue. The question involves determinations of the personhood status of the fetus, and the correlative matter of the rights due such an unborn person.

As a result of the advances in fetal treatment and techniques, the fetus now finds him or herself in the unaccustomed position of bearing operable conditions. The preborn child, now treatable, appears almost indistinguishable from other human beings who are similarly operable. Consequently, it is difficult not to posit a comparable right to treatment for the fetus. Depp notes that, as a result of the advent of new diagnostic techniques and fetal surgery, "we are now in a position where we must view the fetus seriously from a medical, legal and ethical standpoint as a patient."

As a result, we can easily posit sundry rights, including a right to life, for the unborn child. Indeed, Depp goes so far as to posit that his unborn patient is "at some point . . . a person." "So at that point, to me, I think I have a special responsibility to that individual."

Senator Humphrey also questioned extensively regarding the pain-killing techniques fetal surgeons use. Doctors anesthetize (which effectively renders the patient insensate to pain) or narcotize (inject a narcotic through a vein so that "you care less about pain") both the mother and the fetus. Depp narcotizes his patients—the woman and her child. The mother, then, experiences less pain due to the incisions and nausea. The fetus gets "sleepy" and becomes less active, making the placement of the catheter easier and less risky. Depp also confirms that the fetus on which he operates, feels pain, and this too justifies the narcotization of the infant. "They do feel. . . . they feel the needle and they move out of the way. They feel pressure. . . ."

The field of perinatology encounters the same ethical concerns regarding the status of the fetus. Perinatology, by definition, also deals with two patients—the fetus and the mother—though individual perinatologists may establish different "personhood" standards for the fetus. An informal definition might describe the discipline (a subspeciality of neonatology) as a combination of the fields of pediatrics and obstetrics. Dr. Gary Sheldon, a perinatologist from St. John's Hospital in St. Louis, Missouri, noted that the field concerns itself with problems during the pregnancy, and with difficulties around the birth. Indeed, Sheldon indicated many perinatologists consider their province to extend even before conception.

Sheldon, as did Depp and Colliton, termed the advent of sophisticated ultrasound imaging systems "the single most important advance" facilitating this new approach to the fetus as patient. The ability to visualize anatomic defects, track fetal motion, monitor growth and development and evaluate individual organs have all advanced the perinatologist's understanding of the pre-born infant.

Several conditions avail themselves to some degree of correction by the perinatologist. In addition to the operable conditions discussed by Depp, Sheldon discussed maternal diabetes mellitus (the mother suffers a diabetic condition that seriously affects the developing infant's health), intrauterine growth retardation and fetal functional cardiac abnormalities.

Sheldon also detailed various remedies available to the perinatologist faced with these conditions. Doctors may indirectly advance the health of the fetus by treating the mother, or it may directly address the fetal condition through numerous treatments aimed at the infant in utero. The first path involves improvement of maternal nutrition, restriction of maternal activity, and correction of maternal medical problems. Sheldon also emphasized the treatment of maternal diabetes condition as a therapy whose corollary purpose is to benefit the fetus.

Regarding the direct addressing of fetal conditions, Sheldon noted the operable conditions described by Depp. An additional, intriguing option involved the direct injection of nutrients into the amniotic fluid, allowing an infant with intrauterine growth retardation to increase nutrition intake. Sheldon also suggested variations in delivery mode (for example, a Caesarean delivery) and in delivery time (inducing labor before term to allow early post-natal treatment).

Paradoxically, the pre-born infants Depp and Sheldon labor to save, are yet candidates for abortion at the determination of the mother and a physician. As Senator Humphrey stressed, this paradox raises disturbing questions with respect to this nation's policy of allowing abortion on demand throughout the nine months of pregnancy. Senator Humphrey also emphasized that the advent of the new technological innovations examined in the hearing provide additional proof and confirmation for the belief that the fetus is a person guaranteed full status as a person with constitutional rights. Professor William May of Catholic University agrees. "I do not think that any subsequent development in medical technology will falsify the truth that we now know; namely, that there is in existence, from the time of the conception and fertilization, a new human life." Thus, regardless of the extent of our knowledge and understanding of the fetus, those rights, that status as person, are inherently due the infant. Any denial of these rights, then, merely represents society's refusal to attribute to the unborn child that which it inherently retains.●

STUDENT LOAN COLLECTIONS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter sent to me by Dr. Ray A. Neff of Marshall, IL.

He points out what I hope is an isolated incident in the collection of student loans.

I have two concerns in the student loan area, in addition to sharing the concern that all of us have—that we collect loans from those who owe us money.

My first concern is that we are giving the impression that there is massive abuse of the student loan system and a high default rate. As a matter of fact, the default rate on student loans is appreciably lower than the default rate at banks on automobile loans.

That does not mean that that default rate should not be lower. I want to do everything I can to help lower it. But the impression abroad is that there is massive default, and that simply is not the case.

My second concern is the type of thing that Dr. Neff points out in his letter. I hope we will be careful not to impose an injustice on people in the process of seeing to it that just debts are paid.

I ask that Dr. Neff's letter be printed in the RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to read it.

The letter follows:

MARSHALL, IL, August 19, 1985.

Hon. PAUL SIMON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SIMON: I am emeritus faculty at Indiana State University, having retired in July of 1984. In 1973 I took sabbatical leave and did graduate work at Ball State University. At that time I took out a student loan through the Dulaney National Bank here in Marshall. I returned to Indiana State University in September of 1974 and over the next several years paid off the loan without delinquency of any kind.

In the Spring of 1984 I began to receive telephone calls from various persons claiming to represent the Illinois Loan Program demanding that I pay up on my student loan. They claimed that I owed over Ten Thousand Dollars. I informed them that my loan was completely paid and that their records were faulty. These persons were both hostile and rude. Several called me "a crook" and referred to me as "a leach."

In August of 1984 a man came to my door and attempted to force his way into my home. He claimed that he represented the Illinois Loan Program and had credentials which seemed to prove it. I refused him entry and called the police but by the time they arrived he was gone.

Subsequently I received a barrage of telephone calls from several persons, some claiming to be with the Illinois Loan Program and all abusive. I finally traced some of these calls to Van Rue Credit, 6141 North Cicero Avenue, Chicago, 60646. On February 15, 1985 I sent Van Ru Credit, by Certified Mail with return receipt, a letter telling them to cease and desist in their harassment of me. I cited the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (15 USCS) and sent copies to the Attorney General of Illinois; the U.S. Attorney; Mr. David Lewis, Clark County States Attorney; and my attorney. Since then I have heard nothing additional from Van Ru Credit.

But now I am being harassed by a Ms. Rosalie Budd of National Legal Services of Chicago, an agency on which I can acquire no information. They have no listed telephone in Chicago nor does anyone seem to know of them. Ms. Budd knows about my personal affairs, my home ownership, my autos, and my bank accounts; she states that they will be seized if I do not pay up immediately. She does however seem to think that I am thirty-nine years old (I am sixty-one).

I recently met with my attorney and we looked into the Illinois Loan Program and the student loan program in general. What we learned was astounding.

For several years I have been hearing "horror stories" from former students who have had autos, stereos, television sets, and even a piano, seized in actions which would be, if they were as they described them, both immoral and illegal. Having dealt with students and their stories for a number of years I manifest a certain disbelief for I could not believe that such things were happening. The claims were that even when the notes were paid collections were demanded and in many instances received. Each instance described a stealthy approach by the collectors with seizures being made without due process.

I have attached a copy of an "Illinois Guaranteed Loan Program" "Interim Note." You will no doubt immediately notice that it is a cognivit note in which judgment is confessed in advance, all rights of the debtor waived, and property encumbered, even before money has been received.

The Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution states, in part:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Cognivit notes, when held by State agencies violate this section of the Constitution. All Illinois Guaranteed Loan Program notes are such instruments and are illegal, and therefore uncollectible, paid or unpaid.

In the August 19, 1985 issue of Time, page 21, there is an article which states that the Internal Revenue Service will be withholding tax refunds to persons who they claim owe unpaid student loans. It is clear that the U.S. Government and the State of Illinois are attempting to do illegally that which they are prevented by the U.S. Constitution from doing legally. They will not test their case in court nor will they even pretend due process. I invite your attention to the wording of the student interim note attached which says in part:

"I hereby irrevocably authorize any attorney-at-law to appear for me in any court of record, in term time or vacation, at any time after default, and to waive issuance and service of process and confess judgment against me in favor of the holder hereof, for such amount as may appear to be unpaid hereon, together with interest, costs of suit and reasonable attorneys' fees, and to release all errors, waive all right of appeal and consent to the immediate execution upon such judgment . . ."

Under this note it is not necessary for the holder to even prove that money is owed but can collect ". . . such amount as may appear to be unpaid . . ."

I now request that you take whatever action is necessary to bring this horrible scheme to the attention of the Congress since I feel that what is being done is not only unconscionable but criminal. The United States Government and a number of state agencies are involved in what is tantamount to loan sharking.

Very truly yours,

RAY A. NEFF, Ed.D.●

THE FARM TRAGEDY

●Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, agriculture today is in a crisis unprecedented since the Great Depression of the 1930's. The statistical evidence of this is abundant. Exports, prices, and credit are all major problem areas.

Every new forecast by the USDA is worse than the one before. Exports this year are forecast to drop 16 percent from last year, and net farm income is forecast to drop 38 percent. Wheat prices in July were the lowest in 7 years, and wheat exports from Houston, the No. 1 wheat export port, are off 65 percent from last year. Cotton exports, much of which come from west Texas, are down from 500,000 bales a week last year to 50,000 bales per week now.

Many farmers are hanging on by a thread that is stretched to and beyond the breaking point. At today's low prices even a bumper crop may only be a break-even year for many farmers. The mountain of farm debt cannot be service, let alone repaid, when agriculture has a negative 15 percent return, which is what Federal Reserve statistics for 1984 show. The farm credit crisis is shaking even the cooperative Farm Credit System.

The statistical evidence of the problems in rural America are impressive, but there is also another side to the story. There is the human tale of individual tragedy repeated time after time after time in small towns all over the farm belt. We must not let ourselves get so buried in a mountain of dry figures that we lose sight of the real problem.

Mr. President, the human side of the farm problem is well illustrated in a short editorial written by Frank Ford of Hereford, TX. I ask that the editorial from the September issue of Acres, U.S.A. be printed in the RECORD as a reminder that our farm problems are people problems, not just statistical problems.

[From Acres, U.S.A., September 1985]

THE CLEANSED

(By Frank Ford)

We buried two young farmers today.

Two weeks ago I heard a top executive of one of the leading grain trading firms say in a radio interview that the "agricultural situation couldn't be straightened out until the system is cleansed (his word) of the (young) farmers with the high debt structures." This is current wisdom in much of our nation's leadership. We have a recovery now, but we can't pay as we go. We must depend upon the wealth from the privileged of the Third World to cover our bond issues and buy our T-bills so that we don't have to tax ourselves. Our wealthy can make the dollar go much farther on their trips in Europe. Executives can plot their corporate takeovers, further draining the money supply and keeping interest rates the highest in modern history. How does this relate to a small Texas community this day in January?

We buried two young farmers today. They loved the land, and they loved farming. They were fine, dedicated, hard working young men. Both in their late 20s had married the sweethearts that they had dated right here in our Texas town. Both were loving, open, giving, responsible husbands whose lives were an inspiration to their families and to all of us who had seen them grow up, active in such things as scouting, Future Farmers, and their church. One of these young fathers had just seen the birth of the fifth child by his beautiful young wife. I saw this precious family just a few weeks ago, full of joy and hope in the face of the depression in agriculture caused by, among other factors, crumbling exports because of our "strong" dollar.

He was a very good farmer . . . one of the best they say. He could not, however, make 16 hour days on the farm pay out. So he took a second job. One night recently, he was bringing a semi-trailer rig into our Texas town from a point up north. It was midnight. His brother-in-law had accompanied him on the trip to keep him company. This young man was the father of three small children. We don't know whether there was an equipment failure or whether my young friend went to sleep from exhaustion. In a few tragic seconds, a rig went out of control, hit an abutment . . . Their small children cried at the funeral. It seemed like the whole town was there. There were many young farmers there. Perhaps unfriendly takeovers and huge deficits and "strong" dollars are more important. But our town hurts today, and we will for a long time.●

DEFENDER'S DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in honor of a glorious vision. On September 14, 1814, as morning dawned on Fort McHenry in Baltimore, Francis Scott Key was being held on a British ship in the harbor. From that ship we had witnessed a night of violence and tyrannical assault. When the sun rose—he saw a wondrous sight: the American flag was still waving in the breeze. Today we celebrate Defender's Day in honor of the efforts of patriotic men and women of America; in particular we honor Francis Scott Key.

Key had gone to the British to negotiate the release of Dr. William Beanes. Key successfully negotiated the release of Dr. Beanes, but, due to the fact that the British invasion plans of Baltimore had been discussed in Key's presence, the British held him until after the attack. Key was so moved after the invasion when he saw the American flag flying that he wrote a poem that started with 'O say can you see by the dawn's early light . . ."

I think we all know, or should know, the rest.

Shortly after the incident, Key went to see a friend, Mrs. J.H. Nicholson, and gave her a copy. Mrs. Nicholson then went to a printer and had the copy made into handbills. The original title was "The Defense of Fort McHenry" but soon gained popularity and was renamed "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Over the years, the song was to become the popular national anthem of the people. By the 1890's, it was specified to be played at all ceremonial events of the Army and Navy. On March 3, 1931, it officially became the national anthem of the United States of America.

It is the song that still brings tears to the eyes of millions of Americans, and I hope it continues to do so forever.●

EXPLODING MYTHS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, some of the most thoughtful editorials that appear anywhere in the Nation are in the Los Angeles Times.

Recently it had an editorial titled, "Exploding Myths," in which they say the climate must be changed if we are to do what we should for the American people.

I could not agree more.

I ask that this fine editorial be printed in the RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to read it.

The editorial follows:

EXPLODING MYTHS

If government policies are based—as they seem to be—on the premise that the poor are lazy, then they must be rewritten from top to bottom. The myth that the poor shun work, when in fact many work harder than the well-to-do and for far less reward, did not stand up under the kind of close inspection involved in last week's Times report on poverty.

On another crucial point, a team of Times reporters wrote that the statistical picture for the poor is as grim now as in any recent time. In the latest federal count in 1983 there were 35.3 million poor people—one American in seven. That's an increase of 11 million in five years. And the poor are getting poorer. At last count the poorest Americans had only 60% of the money that they needed for life's basics. The most tragic statistic of all says that one-fourth of all children under 6 live in poverty. Half of black American children are poor.

Behind the statistics are real people. Hardworking people like Gilbert Maxwell, who cleans up at a shrimp-packing plant in Brunswick, Ga., for $10,800 a year. Or elderly people like Rob Green, 75, and his wife of Dawes Hollow, W.Va., who live on potatoes, beans, a little bacon and a few onions. Or the countless infants who die because their mothers did not eat well during pregnancy and seldom, if ever, saw a doctor.

Why has a country as rich as the United States done so little for its poor?

Programs first launched during the New Deal in the 1930s and then greatly expanded in the 1960s actually had some success in reducing poverty rates and lifting some of the poor into the middle class. But there were also enough failures to give government intervention a bad name. Presidents Gerald R. Ford and Jimmy Carter allowed inflation to eat away the value of anti-poverty aid. By the time Ronald Reagan became President, the political climate allowed deep cuts in programs providing job training and public-service employment, unemployment insurance, food stamps, compensatory education and nutrition for children.

That climate must be changed. If there is one myth that the Times research exploded, it is that there are undeserving poor who will not work. Most of the poor are women with children or the elderly or the infirm. Of the remaining poor, two-thirds work, and work hard—cleaning shrimp plants, making beds in hotels, picking up other peoples' garbage.

Specific steps that government could take to help lift some of the poor out of poverty or to cushion hardships for those who are still locked there include:

Providing welfare payments to the needy even when fathers remain in the home, to encourage families to stay together.

Enacting minimum federal standards for welfare benefits; they vary widely around the country.

Lightening the poor's tax burden by increasing the personal income-tax exemption.

Conducting more intensive experiments with "workfare"—requiring welfare recipients to do community work in return for their benefit checks—as long as they are not structured in ways that punish people for being poor.

Passing tougher child-support laws.

Encouraging corporations and local governments to provide reasonably priced child care. More subsidized day care would make entry-level jobs a reasonable alternative to a welfare check.

Encouraging family-planning programs rather than cutting their funds in endless debates over abortion.

In a series of lectures at Harvard University in April, Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) outlined much of this program. He said during the lectures that Americans "are a surpassingly generous people, not least one supposes because we are, in the end, so blessed, so well-off generally." Faced with natural disasters, Americans aid families that they know to have been devastated. Poverty is our biggest national disaster, and the poor need that same spirit of sharing today.●

EXEMPTION FOR BONDS ISSUED BY ISRAEL FROM IMPUTED INTEREST TAX

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join in sponsoring, S. 1619, legislation offered by my good friend and colleague, the junior Senator from California. The bill he has offered would exempt bonds issued by the State of Israel from section 7872 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1952.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 applied an imputed interest rate to certain below market-rate loans. Subsequently, Congress passed legislation amending the Act to relieve most of the onerous imputed interest provisions. Unintentionally, bonds issued by the State of Israel were not included under the amending legislation. This, of course, was a mere oversight; it would be unconscionable to tax those who want to help our good friend, the State of Israel.

In the volatile Middle East, the United States had had only one stable and trustworthy ally, the State of Israel. since the inception of Israel as a nation in 1948, Israel and the United States have shared a special relationship. This relationship is based upon shared values. These values include a dedication to individual rights and a belief in democracy. Government-sponsored economic and military aid, as well as assistance from the private sector, make the cornerstone of our concrete support. In return, Israel has offered the United States the use of military bases and storage facilities for our rapid deployment force's equipment. Most importantly, Israel is a stable democracy in a historically unstable region.

Israel's debt roughly equals its GNP. Its debt service is almost $4 billion per year, a billion of which is paid to the United States. Most of U.S. economic aid to Israel never leaves the U.S. Treasury because it repays principal and interest on past loans. Because of this, the Israel bonds program is an integral part of our Nation's total assistance to Israel. In 1984, the Israeli Bonds Agency sold $102 million worth of bonds in the United States.

My support for this legislation is strengthened by Israel's own efforts to stabilize its economy. It would be unfair and untimely to allow the enforcement of the imputed interest tax on Israel bonds. I commend the junior Senator from California for working so hard to rectify this problem, and I urge my colleagues to strongly support this legislation.●

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, we have just celebrated Labor Day and it is, therefore, especially heartening to learn of a Government agency where a harmonious relationship exists between highly productive employees and a sensitive, progressive administration. I am referring to the Government Printing Office where management, under the leadership of Ralph Kennickell, the Acting Public Printer of the United States, and labor concluded wage negotiations and signed an agreement without requiring an arbiter for the first time in 6 years. Patience and goodwill on both sides characterized the 2 months of negotiations and were instrumental in the success of the talks.

The Government Printing Office is one agency which has welcomed with open arms the arrival of computers, video composition, and the latest printing and binding equipment. Every worker confronted with changes due to the arrival of the computer age has been afforded an opportunity for retraining. This successful adaptation to modern technology is good Labor Day news and should be noted by other agencies facing similar challenges.

For fiscal year 1985, the Government Printing Office has developed and authorized the largest, most comprehensive training plan in GPO history. It has established a consolidated, expanded employee counseling service in its Office of Personnel. It also has incorporated its Offices of Personnel, Equal Employment Opportunity, Safety, and Labor-Management under an Assistant Public Printer for Human Resources. Besides providing for more rational management, this reorganization has resulted in lower expenditures and, subsequently, more tax savings—welcome news indeed in this time of concern over Federal spending. Congratulations to the employees and management at the Government Printing Office.●

RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY IN CHILE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, September 11 in the United States has little special historical significance; but, in Chile, it represents the anniversary of the bloody coup which destroyed democracy. Twelve years ago, on September 11, 1973, tanks rolled down the broad boulevards of Santiago, jet fighters sent rockets into the Presidential palace, and troops forced thousands of civilians into makeshift prisons in the sports stadiums of Santiago.

The succeeding years have not seen a return to democracy. They have not seen an end to human rights abuse. They have not seen a restoration of civility in the conduct of political life in that country.

Instead, this year alone, the military dictatorship of General Pinochet has killed peaceful demonstrators. Its security forces and intelligence operatives have tortured political prisoners, kidnaped opponents, and left their bodies along roadsides.

Emergency powers were extended once again only this week, as last week's strike and protest demonstrated the national revulsion against the Pinochet regime and the common consensus demanding a return to democracy.

That consensus has been codified in a democratic opposition accord that unites the Democratic Alliance, the traditional political parties in Chile, and the Catholic Church. Under the moral leadership of Archbishop Fresno of Santiago, the opposition accords calls for a return to democracy.

On this anniversary of the destruction of democracy, I would hope that the United States, through the Department of State, would speak out unequivocably in support of the consensus for a speedy return to full democracy in Chile.

I am hopeful that our new Ambassador in Chile, a distinguished foreign service career diplomat, can help begin to present a different view of United States concerns in that country. There is undeniable support among the people of the United States for an end to the dictatorship in Chile. That view should also be transmitted by our Ambassador in his statements and by his actions.

The people of the United States have another reason for desiring to see a return to democracy. For it was the Pinochet regime which planned and then directed the assassination in 1976, of a Chilean diplomat, Orlando Letelier, on the streets of Washington, DC. That assassination also caused the death of a young American woman, Ronnie Karpen Moffett, who was riding in the Letelier car when it was destroyed by a bomb. Her husband, Michael Moffett also was seriously injured in that bombing.

The U.S. Federal court system found that the Chilean secret police has planned and executed the bombing. Every request for cooperation in bringing those responsible for that bombing to justice has been stonewalled by the Pinochet regime. That is another reason for the United States to emphasize our refusal to associate with the Pinochet regime and our demand for a return to democracy.

The Pinochet regime has not relented on its persecution of the Letelier family. Today's Washington Post reports that the sister of Orlando Letelier, Fabiola Letelier, was detained yesterday along with 30 people who were attempting to hold memorial ceremonies for former President Salvador Allende, who died 12 years ago in the military coup which placed Pinochet in power. I strongly urge the Reagan administration to pressure the Pinochet Government to release Fabiola Letelier, as well as those detained along with her, and to end the brutal repression of the Chilean population.

On this anniversary, I would hope that the Chilean regime would be reminded by the international community that we demand nothing less than a return to full democracy and respect for human rights.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD, articles from the Washington Post.

The articles follow:

PINOCHET HITS OPPOSITION, DOES NOT REJECT ITS PLAN—CHURCH-BACKED PLEA FOR DEMOCRACY AT ISSUE

(By Martin Andersen)

SANTIAGO, CHILE, Sept. 11—In a speech marking the 12th anniversary of the bloody coup that brought him to power, Chilean President Augusto Pinochet took a hard line today on a church-backed plan for a return to democracy.

Gen. Pinochet demanded that opponents show they are interested in more than mere "conquest of power" and that attractive rhetoric be backed by "honest deeds."

In a 90-minute speech before about 2,000 military, diplomatic and governmental guests, the president lashed out at critics, saying, "Their anxiety for reaching power at any price makes them try to destabilize the government."

Pinochet said Chile would achieve "true democracy" only by adhering to the terms of an authoritarian constitution he pushed through in 1980 and seemed to step back from a more conciliatory position offered by officials last week on the opposition parties' proposal.

However, Pinochet, did not reject outright the proposed "national accord," as the 11-party agreement signed last month is known. Worked out under the sponsorship of Roman Catholic Cardinal Juan Francisco Fresno, it united opposition groups from across the political spectrum in a call for elections—although with no date specified.

Fresno is said to have stepped in to promote the agreement among the parties in an effort to head off spiraling street protests and political violence that have taken dozens of lives within the last year. The cardinal did not attend the diplomatic gathering. According to an unofficial church account, he stayed away after being informed of the response Pinochet would deliver.

Pinochet did say that among the signatories were sectors that "might have relevant opinions on the institutional development" of Chile, but only if they could show they were interested in more than "just the mere conquest of power."

It was unclear whether these words reflected a subtle shift by the government toward negotiations with civilians. One theory was that the phrasing was part of a government effort to fragment the opposition by signaling a willingness to deal only with the more conservative parties.

"We cannot accept that behind a supposed democratic objective there is the expression and the advance of totalitarian communism," he said, "Some of those who signed this are responsible for the strategy designed to make Chile a mere satellite of the Soviet Union." The Communists were not a party to the accord, but the Marxist Socialists were.

Pinochet also lashed out at non-Marxist parties that, he said, "abandoned their principles" to make alliances against his government.

The opposition's proposal picked up another supporter last night in retired Air Force general Gustavo Leigh. He was a member of the original junta who stepped down several years ago after differing with Pinochet.

Pinochet said Chile was the only nation in history to liberate itself from "Soviet communism," and that because of this his country was the victim of unremitting attacks by groups "that will not accept defeat."

The general said his government attaches special importance to the U.S.-Chilean relations, which he said were based on "friendship, cooperation and mutual respect." He did not comment on the fact that the State Department recently praised the church-backed proposal for a return to democracy.

Santiago was blacked out twice tonight. A pro-government radio station said two power pylons near Santiago had been blown up. Four persons were reported injured in clashes with police in the poor neighborhood of La Legua and seven in the slum district of La Victoria.

At least 30 persons were detained while attempting to hold memorial ceremonies for Socialist expresident Salvador Allende, who died in the presidential palace during the 1973 coup. Among those arrested was Fabiola Letelier, a sister of Orlando Letelier, a minister in Allende's Cabinet who was assassinated in Washington in a bombing laid to agents of Pinochet's government in 1976.

GEN. PINOCHET FACES A UNIFIED OPPOSITION

(By Martin Andersen)

SANTIAGO, CHILE, Sept. 10—Chileans mark the 12th anniversary of military rule here Wednesday as the opposition is expressing optimism that a new 11-party accord, encouraged by the Roman Catholic Church, may start a move back to democracy.

In the wake of antigovernment rioting last week that left 10 dead and scores more injured or arrested, opposition leaders await a definitive response to their two-week-old National Accord for the Transition to Full Democracy.

That response is expected during the anniversary speech of President Augusto Pinochet, the leader of the 1973 coup.

The accord, signed by all major opposition parties except the Communist, was announced by Cardinal Juan Francisco Fresno after several months of secret meetings between politicians and church representatives. Parties remain formally suspended or, in the case of those of the left, outlawed.

A political observer said the accord "astounded" members of the Pinochet government with a call for orderly transition to democracy that appears to have put Pinochet on the political defensive.

Although Pinochet has indirectly attacked the agreement—which had one junta member sputtering insults, later retracted, at Fresno—the government has left the door open to further discussion of it.

Nevertheless, the Interior Ministry announced today a six-month renewal of the emergency powers that Pinochet decreed during major protests two years ago. The 11-party accord calls for cancellation of those special police powers.

Foreign political analysts said the confused official signals reflected Fresno's success in setting a new political agenda for the return to civilian rule.

Pinochet's formula precludes any election until 1989, when the sole candidate would be picked by the military chiefs—and could be Pinochet.

By offering the accord as an alternative, the cardinal has gone beyond traditional church mediation efforts. Its terms call for restoration of political rights and general elections at a date to be negotiated. Until that time, Pinochet's authoritarian 1980 constitution would remain in place, subject to amendments.

Diplomats and political observers here agreed that the accord was a departure from previous opposition efforts, which tended to underestimate the strength of the current rule and to present demands it found unacceptable.

This time, under the direction of Fresno, the opposition's emphasis was on compromise, a rarity among Chile's traditionally fractious parties.

Fresno, awaiting a definitive governmental response, criticized a call by leftist groups and opposition labor leaders for what resulted in a bloody day of protest Sept. 4—the day on which elections were held in precoup Chile. Fresno also called off a memorial mass for a French priest killed in demonstrations last year.

According to Sergio Molina, one of three technicians who helped draft the accord, its tone will force Pinochet to negotiate or be seen as offering as an alternative "an institutionalized version of dictatorship.

"If he ignores us, unpredictable dynamics will be set in motion, and nobody will be able to use reasonable means to stop them," said Molina, who served in a Christian Democratic Cabinet in the mid-1960s.

Seven Cabinet ministers in the government of the late Marxist president Salvador Allende, overthrown in 1973, have announced their support of the plan. Among the signatories were two civilian groups that until recently supported Pinochet—the rightist National Party and a conservative union movement.

Some analysts report indications that the document has also created a wait-and-see attitude within the ranks of the armed forces—who are known to be nervously monitoring the human rights trials of former top military men in neighboring Argentina. The parties' accord calls for avoidance of retribution by either side in any future transition.

Fresno did not include the Communists in the negotiating sessions. Pinochet has repeatedly said he wants Marxism excluded from any future Chilean government.

The exclusion of the Communists was the biggest sticking point in the negotiations among the representatives of the other 11 parties, party leaders said.

In an interview, Molina said Communist Party participation in a civilian-run system was not "a priori" ruled out, but all parties would have to swear loyalty to democratic principles.

For the Communists, who adopted a strategy of "popular rebellion" in 1980, the accord may prove a formidable foil. Observers point out that the party, which traditionally was inclined to political alliances and fearful of isolation, is now relegated to the left margin of the political spectrum, along with the Revolutionary Leftist Movement guerrillas.

"The presence of the Communist Party could have disturbed others, and some of its declarations, inciting violence, were incompatible with the call for reconciliation," Molina said.

"The Communists say that in a democratic government they would act differently; we are saying that when we have power these will be the rules of the game." A few other Chilean parties proclaimed Marxism in the past, but they operated within the democratic system when it existed.

"The accord was a message to the military that the democratic opposition is also concerned about Communist activity, and that unlimited revenue will not be unleashed on the armed forces once the civilians take power," said a Western European diplomat.

The diplomat echoed a widely heard view following last week's violence that the outbreak did not overly strain Fresno's delicate efforts.

The observers said both the government and the opposition seem now to be trying to create dissent within the ranks of the other.

"The agreement isolates Pinochet, but it can be dangerous if he can get [the accord's] participants to fall into arguing among themselves, while at the same time the momentum gained by social mobilization through street protests is lost," said Jorge Schaulsohn, a lawyer and activist with the small, center-left Radical Party. "He did it in 1983."

Schaulsohn supports the accord, but said he worries that too much may be given away in order to outflank the government on the right. Exclusion of the Communist Party signals the isolation of the sectors that have been most combative against the military, he added.

ARTS AND THE HANDICAPPED

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, during the recent Senate recess, I was pleased to see an article in USA Today in which Jean Kennedy Smith was interviewed about her work at the National Committee, Arts for the Handicapped. Mrs. Smith is a founding member of this innovative program and is the sister of our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts.

The National Committee is an educational affiliate of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. It has earned a superb national reputation for its outreach to young people with disabilities. The program effectively demonstrates that the arts can reach individuals who are challenged with handicaps and spark creativity and enthusiasm which may otherwise have gone unnoticed.

As the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities, I have a very special interest in this area and have the highest regard for the professional and compassionate approach that Mrs. Smith and the National Committee embody in their work.

I commend this article to my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From USA Today, Aug. 21, 1985]

(Topic: Arts & Handicapped—Jean Kennedy Smith, 57, is a founding member of The National Committee, Arts with the Handicapped. Long active in helping the handicapped, she is on the national education committee of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and was a recent recipient of the Jefferson Award. She was interviewed by USA Today's Barbara Reynolds)

IF YOU LOSE ONE SENSE, YOU DEVELOP ANOTHER

USA TODAY. You have been working with the handicapped for more than 10 years. How do art programs help them?

SMITH. Obviously, the arts are very important in everybody's life. Certainly children with disabilities should have an opportunity to enjoy and appreciate the arts and to create. And art is a very important educational tool. There are children who can learn through the arts—for instance, children with autistic problems. Children who don't speak can learn through puppets. They will talk through puppets.

USA TODAY. Do you have any specific success stories?

SMITH. Jason, a child in our arts festival program in Connecticut, was born blind with cerebral palsy. He can play the piano very well and can actually learn mathematics. It's a way to teaching because he has to learn notes. So it can be used for that. It can also be used to improve self-awareness, the confidence you get from doing your dramatic reading, your memory when you have to do something in a play, or your coordination when you're learning to dance.

USA TODAY. Haven't you had extraordinary success with ballet?

SMITH. One of our programs with the blind is with the Alvin Ailey Ballet Company. When those children first came in, I saw them. They felt they were falling off a ledge all the time. Gradually, they learned very effectively. Some of them are now in the regular dance course. It has a two-fold purpose: It's good educationally and it's good because it's fun.

USA TODAY. Do handicapped people bring an added dimension to art?

SMITH. In some cases, they certainly do. We have a project now in the Goldwater Hospital in New York, where there are adults who are mostly disabled either from a stroke or just being older, and they've been in the hospital for a while. We have a project there with PEN, a professional writers' group, and they had some of the most beautiful poetry. Some of these people who couldn't even speak, who had to tap it out on a machine, wrote beautiful poetry that really came from the depths of emotion—that the rest of us don't really feel.

USA TODAY. Are you saying that the handicapped, who have often lost a lot, gain sensitivity in other areas?

SMITH. That is very possible. I was recently in Ireland, and I saw a boy who was 17 and blind. He was in the pottery class. He made an incredible face from clay. It was absolutely beautiful. I suppose in his hands, his fingers, he has an extra sense that people who see don't understand. They often say you develop one side if you're missing another side. That could be true.

USA TODAY. What are some of your committee's projects?

SMITH. The first thing is our Special Arts Festival, where we have disabled and able-bodied children come together and celebrate the arts. The idea behind that is to have arts programs in the schools for children, and they have a day of festival. We now have one at the Kennedy Center, and have about 600,000 children involved in these festivals nationwide. Beyond that, we have special projects: the Alvin Alley Dance Project for the blind and visually impaired, a project for retired teachers to come back and help with the festival program, a project to teach creative writing in hospitals, a project with Humana Hospital to get the art from the festivals into hospitals, where patients pick the art they would like to hang in their room during their stay there.

USA TODAY. Have you expanded your programs to other countries?

SMITH. We have our international affiliate, which just started. We have 35 countries now affiliated with us. They are organizing festivals and taking on some of these projects. For example, we have the Young Playwrights' Project, which is from the Kennedy Center, where we have able-bodied and disabled students who will write about some form of disability, either together or separately.

USA TODAY. Although you are committed to mainstreaming the handicapped, how do you counter the perception that policy may be too costly and to bothersome to able-bodied people?

SMITH. It's not costly. There really isn't any additional cost involved, and I don't think that's what our sights should be tuned to. The idea is to open up these opportunities to these children who deserve it as much as any other child does. For instance, with the deaf children, Gallaudet is a very good university in Washington. Dance is very appropriate for all children, and the deaf are extremely good at it, as well as acting, and they should be given that chance. It's perhaps a little more work, but it's not a great amount of money.

USA TODAY. Does the general public understand the potential handicapped people can fulfill?

SMITH. Not completely. But more and more they are. In the last 10 years, it's changed quite dramatically, and people are beginning to understand that these children can, given the chance, do most everything.

USA TODAY. How did you get involved in this?

SMITH. I was the head of the Kennedy Center Education Committee in Washington. They were extremely interested in arts education, and they felt that the Kennedy Center could make a strong appeal in that direction. So when I was the chairman, I wondered what they did for children with handicaps. So we conducted a big, annual investigation with some other members of the board. We found that things were being done, but more or less in isolation throughout the country. We felt we could get these groups to make an impact, and we could increase public awareness that these children could do anything, given the chance. So we formed a committee for that, and there's been a tremendously positive reaction.

USA TODAY. Your elder sister Rosemary is mentally handicapped. Did that increase your interest in this problem?

SMITH. Yes, it definitely did. With Rosemary, it was very difficult for my parents to find many programs for mentally handicapped children. So I realized when she was growing up that this was a problem. It naturally interested me to see if there had been any development in this area. As you know, my sister Eunice has been very active and my brother John was very active in adopting legislation.

USA TODAY. You have some great examples of untapped talent.

SMITH. For instance, William Britt who was 30 years in a state institution. He was retarded, and then came back, lived in a halfway house, and has turned out to be a terrific painter. He now goes to a community college. He gets an A in art. One of his paintings he gave Gov. Cuomo and it's going to be at the mall in Albany. He has real talent there. I think there's a lot that we haven't even touched.

USA TODAY. Although Nancy Reagan is supportive of the handicapped, does President Reagan undo her good will by cutting the buget for programs for the handicapped?

SMITH. Well, we are supported by Congress. We are supported by discretionary funds form the Department of Education. We also raise private funds. The president has been supportive. We had a national festival at the White House a few years ago, where groups came from all over the country into Washington, to the Kennedy Center for three days, and we had a reception at the White House. The group was there and Mrs. Reagan addressed the group. She was very supportive.

USA TODAY. Do you support abortions when tests show a great potential for a child being born retarded or mentally impaired?

SMITH. I certainly don't

USA TODAY. Why not?

SMITH. Because if you talk to parents of children with handicapping conditions, in most cases they are exceptional people in evey way. We all take our chances with children, and you can never call it. You can have a perfectly well child who might turn out to be for you a disaster. I just think that's God's gift, and that everybody has strengths in some direction or another. So they can be a great consolation, really, as my sister has been to me, to all of us.

USA TODAY. What kinds of changes do you still think are needed to improve conditions for the handicapped?

SMITH. I would like to see more integration with the handicapped. I would like to see them brought into the mainstream more. I would like to end their isolation. I would like them to be accepted for what they are, not for stereotyped things, old-fashioned ideas people still have about somebody with a handicapping condition. That's why the arts are very helpful—they really do bring these children into the mainstream.

USA TODAY. You were recently awarded the Jefferson Award. Did that have special meaning to you?

SMITH. I couldn't believe I was going to get an award for something. This work really has been tremendously enjoyable and challenging to me. So I was thrilled to be getting an award for something I love doing. That's the funny part of it.

VERY SPECIAL ARTS

The National Committee, Arts with the Handicapped, an educational affiliate of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington was founded in 1974. Some of the committee projects include:

Artists Unlimited: Works with Humana Hospitals in Louisville and New York City to establish a model for bringing the visual arts to hospitalized and handicapped persons.

Itzhak Periman Award: Designed to identify artists with disabilities and provide them with recognition and career assistance; open to young people between the ages of 10 and 21.

Pen Creative Writing: Conducts creative writing workshops for patients in hospitals and institutions in conjunction with the PEN American Center, an international association of writers.

REAP: Designed to tap the talents and energies of retired educators and other volunteers to assist in providing arts experiences to persons with disabilities in schools, institutions.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATIONS BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, the following determination has been made by the Select Committee on Ethics pursuant to its responsibilities under paragraph 4 of rule 35.

The Select Committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Ronald R. Mierzejewski of the staff of Senator FRANK MURKOWSKI, be permitted to participate in a program in the People's Republic of China, sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute from August 18-31, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Mierzejewski in the program in the People's Republic of China, at the expense of the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Jefferson B. Seabright of the staff of Senator JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER IV, be permitted to participate in a program in the People's Republic of China, sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, from August 18 to September 1, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Seabright in the program in the People's Republic of China, at the expense of the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. David Jensen, Deputy Staff Director of the Majority Policy Committee be permitted to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from August 17 to 24, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Jensen in the program in Taipei, Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Miss Elizabeth Arens, a member of the staff of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, be permitted to participate in a program in southern Africa, sponsored by the South Africa Foundation, from August 16-29, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Miss Arens in the program in southern Africa, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Ms. Margaret M. Hunt, a member of the staff of Senator JEREMIAH DENTON, be permitted to participate in a program in southern Africa, sponsored by the South Africa Foundation, from August 17-29, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Ms. Hunt in the program in southern Africa, at the expense of the South Africa Foundation, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Michael E. Hammond of the staff of Senator JAMES A. MCCLURE be permitted to participate in a program in the Republic of China, sponsored by Soochow University, from August 17-25, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Hammond in the program in the Republic of China, at the expense of Soochow University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Ms. June Walton, of the staff of the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Government Processes, be permitted to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from August 17-25, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Ms. Walton in the program in Taipei, Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Robert J. Shapiro of the staff of Senator DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN, and Messrs. Douglas L. Miller and Kevin V. Schieffer, of the staff of Senator LARRY PRESSLER, be permitted to participate in a program in the People's Republic of China, sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, from August 17-31, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Shapiro, Mr. Miller, and Mr. Schieffer, in the program in the People's Republic of China, at the expense of the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Joel S. Lisker, of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism staff, be permitted to participate in a program in South Africa, Mozambique, and Zimbabwe, sponsored by South Africa Foundation, from August 17-30, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Lisker in the program in southern Africa, at the expense of the South Africa Foundation, to discuss United States-South African relations, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. John Ritch of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff be permitted to participate in a program in the People's Republic of China, organized by the United States-China Friendship Program, and sponsored by the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, from August 18 through September 1, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Ritch in the program in the People's Republic of China, at the expense of the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs in conjunction with the United States-Asia Institute, to discuss United States-Chinese relations, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Miss Susan C. Schwab of the staff of Senator JOHN C. DANFORTH, be permitted to participate in a program in Mexico City, Mexico, sponsored by the American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico, from September 1-3, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Miss Schwab in the program in Mexico City, Mexico, at the expense of the American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Randolph Collins of the staff of Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr., be permitted to participate in a program in Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from August 17-25, 1985.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. William D. Phillips of the staff of Senator TED STEVENS, be permitted to participate in a program in South Africa, sponsored by the South Africa Foundation, from August 17–30, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Collins in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University, and the participation by Mr. Phillips in the program in South Africa, at the expense of the South Africa Foundation, was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The Select Committee received a request for a determination under rule 35 that Mr. Alex Echols of the staff of Senator ROBERT KASTEN be permitted to participate in a program in Toronto, Canada, sponsored by the Center for Legislative Exchange, from June 8–9, 1985.

The committee determined that participation by Mr. Echols in the program in Toronto, Canada, at the expense of the Center for Legislative Exchange was in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

STIRRING THE POT AT CAMPBELL'S

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, corporate America is facing growing competitive challenges. Corporate management cannot assume that yesterday's solutions will work tomorrow.

The Campell Soup Co. is a large, old company led by President R. Gordon McGovern, that, clearly, is taking significant steps to adapt. It has decentralized, trying to marshal the imagination and responsiveness of entrepreneurs within the framework of a giant firm.

I might add, at the same time, Campbell's maintains a laudable commitment to Camden, the hard pressed city in New Jersey that is its home.

I ask that a recent article about the company and its management be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE REVENGE OF THE FORTUNE 500

(By Joel Kotkin)

Mark Sherman is a man obsessed by a radical marketing vision. The onetime proprietor of Gathering Winds, a tiny natural-foods company in upstate New York, he set off a year ago to seek a far more lucrative niche among the upscale shoppers of suburban Washington, D.C.

"As an entrepreneur, I go where the opportunities are," said the slender, 35-year-old Sherman as he inspected a supermarket kiosk stocked with prepared gourmet dishes—Sole Véronique, Chicken Salad Jacques—from his Today's Taste line. "There's a huge need for natural-food products for a market segment that isn't being served yet. Eldridge Cleaver used to say that you're either part of the solution or part of the problem. Here I'm effecting a solution in terms of fresh foods and the needs of the market."

Should this unrehabilitated child of the 60's as Sherman calls himself, succeed in his mission, the effect could be revolutionary indeed for the nation's booming $11-billion specialty-foods industry. By offering fresh, low-fat, low-salt prepared foods at the supermarket counter, Sherman would pose a major challenge to the delicatessens, gourmet shops, and restaurants that have been fattening themselves on a market now growing some 20% a year.

The real threat, however, is not Sherman's messianic marketing concept, but the power that stands behind it. For while Sherman considers himself a small-business man at heart and calls Today's Taste "a university for entrepreneurial learning," the people paying the tuition—and Sherman's fat consultant's fee—hail from one of America's most venerable corporate institutions: Campbell Soup Co.

Some executives at the Camden, N.J.-based giant, which had sales of $3.7 billion last year, think its prepared gourmet food experiment might blossom into a $100-million business over the next few years. And Sherman's pilot project is just one part of the company's wide-ranging drive to expand outside its mainstream grocery business—and into product lines hitherto dominated by small companies.

Much of this drive revolves around what Campbell marketing research director Tony Adams calls consumer "hot buttons"—buzzwords like "fresh," "healthful," and "high quality." Fresh Chef, for instance, a project now being test-marketed in the Denver area, offers a line of salads that, like Today's Taste, could end up competing with thousands of specialized food packagers, stores, and restaurants.

"There's a sense of entitlement [among consumers] for top-quality food that entrepreneurs have captured really well," explains Adams. "If we're not participating in this type of business, we could end up competing for only 50% of the food dollar. We cannot stick with our traditional business alone. We must find new directions."

"IT'S LIKE GULLIVER IS GETTING UP"

"New directions" is an innocuous-sounding phrase, but make no mistake: When a company the size of Campbell changes direction, small companies don't want to be in its path. And it isn't only food companies that need to look over their shoulders these days.

What is happening at Campbell reflects a broader trend among Fortune 500 toward a more sophisticated form of giantism. By marrying the inherent advantages of bigness with the customer-oriented marketing savvy characteristic of small organizations, these increasingly intelligent leviathans are threatening the long-range health of literally thousands of small entrepreneurial companies.

"I don't think a company can stay small today and survive," says veteran Florida-based consumer product developer Wilson L. Harrell (see "Profile of a Compulsive Entrepreneur," April, page 78). "Any major company today knows more about the niche business than the entrepreneur running the company. Used to be the major companies had a syndrome: If they didn't think of it, it couldn't be right. But so many new products in the past decade came out of small companies and big companies have found that buying or imitating is easier than developing internally."

Harrell, of course, is overstating the case. Not every large company in America has learned the art of niche-marketing, and many small companies have found ways to survive onslaughts by the giants (see sidebar, page 41). What's more, the much-ballyhood notion of "intrapreneurship"—the attempt to apply entrepreneurial techniques within large organizations—is no more than a fad in many companies and, like most fads, it may fade before it has much lasting effect.

When a major corporation does develop an entrepreneurial intelligence, however—or even an approximation of one—entrepreneurs in the same industry have serious cause for concern. One obvious example is microcomputers. Just a few years ago, Adam Osborne scornfully predicted that IBM Corp. could never adjust to the fast pace of the personal computer business. Yet within three years of setting up its separate Personal Computer business unit in Boca Raton, Fla., IBM established a dominant 40% market share in the $6.6-billion industry, helping to drive many smaller competitors, including Osborne's company, into bankruptcy.

And some innovation-conscious giants are doing more than just attacking markets created by smaller companies. Increasingly, they are introducing new products lines before their entrepreneurial competitors can get out of the starting gate.

Twenty years ago, the conventional wisdom was to ignore niche markets until someone else had proved there was a large business to be had. Former Faberge Inc. executive Bob Berglass, for example, remembers pleading with Faberge management to get into the men's hair-coloring business in the late 1960s. "They told me it wasn't a big enough category," recalls Berglass, now president and chairman of DEP Corp., a Rancho Dominguez, Calif., cosmetics manufacturer with sales last year of $18.7 million. "They said, 'Real men don't color their hair.' So out of the blue comes Grecian Formula, and all of a sudden, there's a $20-million-to-$2.5-billion business, and they own half of it."

Today, Berglass has firsthand evidence that large companies are much more aggressive. Early in 1984, DEP—a company based largely on a line of hair-styling gels—found itself competing with the styling mousse, a product introduced by cosmetics giant L'Oréal and soon followed by similar products from the likes of Revlon Inc. and Alberto-Culver Co. Despite its smaller size, DEP could not beat the giants to the punch.

"The big companies now realize they have to go into every possible category that can grow," Berglass says. "It's scary that the sleeping giants have woken up. It's like Gulliver is getting up—and the Lilliputians are getting nervous."

"WE WERE SCARED OF GETTING WIPED OUT"

What woke Gulliver up? What inspired a company like Campbell to move away from almost total reliance on its established product lines and toward a marketing strategy that challenges entrepreneurs for control of the food industry's key growth areas?

"We were scared of getting wiped out," explains Campbell president R. Gordon McGovern, the lanky 58-year-old marketeer who was promoted five years ago from the company's Pepperidge Farm Inc. subsidiary. "We sensed the world was changing. If we didn't pick up what the entrepreneurs were doing, we figured we'd end up like the dinosaurs."

Extinction might seem an unlikely fate for such a large and well-anchored company. Yet when McGovern became president in 1980, there was ample cause for concern.

For decades, Campbell had relied on its superb manufacturing technology, its easy access to domestic and international raw materials, and its marketing and distribution power to dominate the condensed-soup market (in which it accounts for some 80% of U.S. sales). In addition—through in-house development or acquisitions—it had established itself as either the first or second player in such mass-market areas as canned beans, vegetable juice, pickles, and TV dinners.

By the early 1980s, however, many of these categories seemed to be losing consumer appeal. From 1975 to 1981, shipments of Campbell's classic line of "red and white" soups dropped from 55.5 million cases to 49 million; sales of the company's Swanson TV Dinners dropped from 16.4 million cases in 1975 to 10.5 million in 1982. In fact, over the past two years, sales of dry grocery items in general have been steadily decreasing, while other food sectors—notably restaurants and refrigerated items—have expanded. Meanwhile, sales of high-quality specialty foods are up from an estimated $6.8 billion to more than $11 billion since 1980, and—according to Frost & Sullivan, a New York City-based market research firm—they could hit $20 billion by 1990.

These trends helped keep Campbell's annual growth at 8% during the past 10 years, far below the industry average of 12% to 13%. Not surprisingly, the company's stock remained fairly flat throughout the period. "Campbell was very, very conservatively run—kind of like a utility company: low growth, low profitability," says William Leach, an analyst for the New York City-based securities firm Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette. "A friend used to say that following Campbell was like sitting and watching the grass grow."

Yet upper management seemed ill-prepared to switch gears. Harold Shaub, McGovern's predecessor, bristles at the suggestion that McGovern was brought in to revitalize a company in trouble, pointing out that Campbell remained dominant in its key markets and maintained exceptionally high bond credit ratings throughout his eight-year reign. "Stodgy? OK, let's accept that," says Shaub, now retired, who was known as a tight-lipped, production-oriented executive. "But the company served its consumers, its employees, and its stockholders very well. . . . I didn't think we needed a change, necessarily."

When McGovern—who was Shaub's personal choice as a successor, and who claims that Shaub did see problems on the horizon—took charge, this defensive attitude began to shift. "Before, our whole world was Camden," recalls Martin B. Buchalski, a 17-year company veteran who now runs the refrigerated-foods business unit. "McGovern changed all that. Our strategy became tied not just to what was happening here, but to what was happening in the outside world."

"When I got here, we were driven by the consumer about 5%," McGovern says bluntly. "We made the tomato soup and you bought it." If the company had not changed, he believes, "We would have lost units; we would have lost market shares, we would have been chasing cost advantages that would have been eroded by reduced volumes.

"I'm a biologist," he continues—he has an A.B. in biology from Brown University to go with his Harvard MBA—"and I think that ultimately, either you're growing or you're dying."

LOOKING FOR THE ENTREPRENEURIAL ITCH

Convinced that Campbell was missing the action in the food business, McGovern began looking for inspiration, not from within his own 116-year-old company, but from entrepreneurs like Murray Lender of Lender's Bagel Bakery and Mo Siegel of Celestial Seasonings Inc. "Both those guys taught me a lot," he says. "They had the right feedback systems. They were quick to act. It takes us too long to get things through management."

To overcome that weakness, McGovern broke Campbell into some 50 independent business units—averaging $50 million in sales—and gave each a charter to develop its own products. Each business unit has its own general manager who, as effective chief executive officer, has under him a marketing director, controller, and product development staff.

"McGovern lets the managers play on their own until he hears the glass break," observes one company insider. "Everyone goes out, comes up with ideas, and competes for resources. Each unit is run like an independent company except that McGovern plays the banker."

This decentralized system represents a dramatic shift from a past in which Campbell's research and development department in Camden worked in splendid isolation from the line managers charged with marketing their creations—a process that, not surprisingly, led to the development of products that were incompatible with actual market conditions. For instance, McGovern recalls the time that the R&D staff approached him at Pepperidge Farm with a frozen cheesecake they had been working on for two years. The cake was good—except that it tasted exactly like the competing Sara Lee products.

Now, innovation seems rampant at Campbell. In 1984 alone, the company introduced 92 new products, bringing its five-year total to 334—far more than such larger competitors at Beatrice, Nestle, and General Foods. And although not all the new products have been clear successes (some, such as Pepperidge Farm's Star War cookies, were notable failures), others have reaped spectacular rewards. Two new products introduced in 1983, Prego Spaghetti and Le Menu Frozen Dinners, already contribute a combined $450 million a year to Campbell's coffers.

From 1980 to 1984, the company's sales rose 43% while earnings climbed 57%. Its 11% sales growth last year was more than twice that of such competitors as General Mills, General Foods, and Nabisco Brands. Campbell's stock price has more than doubled in the past two years, to nearly 40 points above its highest level in the '70s.

These strong results, along with a flood of favorable publicity in the business press, have helped McGovern recruit a new cadre of tough, marketing-oriented executives. These young managers—who McGovern sees as central to the company's drive into new markets—are also the reason why Campbell is currently revising its compensation schemes along more entrepreneurial lines. Eventually, top executives may receive up to 50% of their pay in the form of incentive bonuses.

"We are looking for people who are not so crazy as to sell their house or their mother-in-law to start a business; we are looking for someone who has that kind of [entrepreneurial] itch, but doesn't want to go all the way," McGovern explains. "Can you succeed in these markets with that kind of person? I think you can."

SOUPING UP THE SOUPS

Real entrepreneurs—the kind who do go all the way—might well be skeptical: There are serious questions as to how fast Gordon McGovern, or anyone else, can change the culture of a corporate behemoth, assuming he can do it at all. Even if the changes are slow, however, and even if Campbell can never be truly entrepreneurial, a half-awake giant is more dangerous competition than a sleeping one.

McGovern's new breed of manager is most visible on such trendy projects as Today's Taste. Yet even in the supposedly safe soup area, Campbell's president—concerned about inroads by such specialty companies as Ogden Corp's Progresso Quality Foods and scores of smaller businesses—has brought in younger people with the marketing flair to deal with niche-oriented upstarts.

Larry A. Carpenter, a 29-year-old senior marketing manager in the soup business unit, epitomizes the sort of quasi-entrepreneuer now in ascendance in Camden. Clean-cut and immaculately pin-striped, Carpenter once considered launching his own company. Lured instead to Campbell from Procter & Gamble Co., he now claims that he is enjoying "the best of both worlds"—the autonomy and new-production orientation of a start-up combined with the security that comes from working at a huge, multinational corporation.

"Everybody in this age has that entrepreneurial desire," Carpenter says. "But I like the security of a company that's been around since 1869 and has sound financials."

Equally important, Campbell has given Carpenter major responsibility for the revitalization of a product line that last year accounted for nearly $1 billion in sales. During the past year, he has presided over an array of new product introductions, including several premium lines, such as Creamy Natural Soups. "This place is a marketer's dream," he says. "What mom-and-pop operation could give you these resources to develop new products?"

For Carpenter, it may be a dream—but for small soup companies, it is a nightmare come true. By going after regional, gourmet, and health-food markets, Campbell threatens to annex the few inches of the soup shelf it doesn't already control.

"Things seem to be happening at a frantic pace at Campbell," says a concerned Jody Graves, president of Real Fresh Inc., a Visalia, Calif., food packer that makes a line of specialty soups called Andersen's. "It's affected our business—and not in a positive way. It's getting tougher all the time to get that shelf space."

It is not hard to appreciate Graves's predicament. Campbell still has the same basic size advantage that has long made it the dominant force in soups. Now its new lines are competing for the same upscale customers who have been buying Andersen's Split Pea, Split Pea with Bacon, Tomato, and Cream of Potato soups.

Under such pressure, Real Fresh, whose sales slowed in 1983 and '84, has been forced to beef up its marketing operation, concentrating on its California base. "These days, it seems Campbell wants to be everywhere," observes Real Fresh district sales manager Don Wagner, who projects well under $10 million in sales for the Andersen's line in 1985 despite a recent upturn. "They have the bread-and-butter of condensed soups. They have the chunky soups. They have the new creamy natural and the summer soups coming up.

"It's clear they want to be Mr. Soup, and they're marching out their specialty soups to do it. What can I say? Good marketing."

IF YOU CAN'T BEAT 'EM, BUY 'EM

In soups, obviously, Campbell has an edge; all it has to do is identify the niches and move in. But what happens when it goes after niches it knows nothing about, where the odds might favor David over Goliath? The easiest thing may be for Goliath to buy David, fatten him up, and turn him loose on any other upstarts in the neighborhood.

Acquisitions have helped increase the percentage of food-industry assets held by the 50 largest players from slightly more than 30% in 1950 to almost 60% today. From 1981 to 1984, there were more than 250 recorded mergers in the industry, with a total price tag of roughly $15 billion. Media attention has focused on the largscale mergers. Yet just as significant, perhaps, has been the giants' increasing interest in small companies. Over the past two years alone, some of the most promising entrepreneurial concerns—including Celestial Seasonings, Hain's Pure Food, Lender's Bagel Bakery, Häagen-Dazs, and ricecake maker Chico-San—have been swallowed up by larger companies eager to cash in on fast-growing niches.

"Companies are getting bought very early in their histories, with sales unually well under $50 million," observes Tomi Simic, vice-president of research for W.T. Grimm & Co., a Chicago firm specializing in mergers and acquisitions. "Will we ever see someone build another Campbell? I don't know. It's terribly hard to build a large company like that anymore."

Gordon McGovern agrees. In fact, given the new marketing acuity of the giants—as well as their long-standing financial and manufacturing leverage—he believes that small growth companies in the food industry now have three basic options: stay small, get acquired, or get crushed.

"We look at them once they come up on our screen," McGovern says." Once they get anywhere, they'll have five people offering them 25 times earnings. If they stay independent, they'll get crushed. Mid-size is the danger point. There won't be any small regional business puffing along on the margins anymore."

Many in the food industry think McGovern is right. If he is, things will get a lot tougher for entrepreneurs like Joseph Unanue.

Unanue is president of Goya Foods Inc., the nation's largest Hispanic-owned food company, based in Secaucus, N.J. Long the dominant player in its niche, with 1984 sales of just under $200 million, the family-owned Goya suddenly found Campbell in its backyard last year when McGovern's company acquired Casera Foods Inc., a longtime Goya competitor with sales of roughly $50 million. "When the news came, we all thought about it," Unanue admits. "When they do whatever they do, they'll come hitting hard—Campbell is a very good company and a very profit-minded company."

Yet despite his respect for Campbell, the Brooklyn-born Unanue radiates an almost eerie confidence. For one thing, he believes Hispanics will remain loyal to "the foods they grew up with." He also suspects that large companies will have trouble penetrating the network of small markets, or bodegas, that account for up to half the food purchases by Spanish speakers in such cities as New York. Finally, Unanue believes that as a public company, Campbell lacks the patience to expand Casera's market presence—now largely concentrated in Puerto Rico—onto the mainland. "Will [Campbell's] stockholders be happy about this," he asks with a shrug, "if it doesn't bring in the money right away?"

Unanue, however, may be living in the past. Under the type of managers who dominated large corporations in previous decades, there may have been a tendency for a company like Campbell to give up at the first sign of trouble. But Gordon McGovern is no green-eyeshade bean counter, unable to see beyond the next quarterly statement. He has shown a remarkable willingness to endure short-term losses for the promise of long-term profits.

Nor is it wise to underestimate the resources Campbell brings to Casera. For one thing, Campbell offers a ready-made national distribution system that can penetrate mainstream supermarkets across the country. In addition, Campbell has year-round access to high-quality raw materials at prices no smaller company can match. And using teams of manufacturing experts, Campbell has cut Casera's production costs by as much as 2% in one year—allowing it to hold the line on prices and appeal to budget-conscious consumers.

"Casera provides the authenticity, and they know the Hispanic market. We provide the new equipment, the operations experience, the industrial engineering," explains Kirk W. Leighton, the group general manager at Campbell with responsibility for the Casera operation. "They have all the markings of a predominant player, and we think we can help get them there."

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING CAMPBELL

Casera may not get there overnight; it may be years before Goya Foods feels the pressure. But one of the most frightening things about a Campbell-size company is that, unlike a smaller competitor, it doesn't have to win in the short run. And it is Campbell's willingness to make mistakes and sustain losses, finally, that makes it such a threat to entrepreneurs.

When the company decided in 1981 to start marketing pure fruit juice, for example, it expected to emerge quickly as a dominant player. The competition consisted largely of small health-food companies and independent packers; none of Campbell's fellow leviathans seemed about to come out with the same product.

Yet Campbell's push into the blended fruit juice business—which grew 25% from September 1983 to September 1984—has been plagued by a series of major marketing mistakes. For one thing, the company rolled out production so cautiously that the Juice Works program has yet to achieve national distribution. And such major competitors as Welch Foods Inc. and Libby, McNeill & Libby Inc. had their own products out before the people in Camden knew what hit them.

"The concept was one of the best ever—to create a product that could compete with Hawaiian Punch and still be good for kids," recalls Gary Hess, general manager of Campbell's beverages business unit. "But we goofed around with it so long that we were no longer the first in the market."

"Doing things with Campbell has been hard," says Terry Simmers, president of Juice Bowl Products Inc.—a Lakeland, Fla., company acquired by Campbell in 1982—who has been involved in the Juice Works project. "Working in a small company, you're used to making quick decisions. But it takes so much trouble to move products through all the layers of decision making that sometimes you forget what you're deciding. I'm still trying to learn about that bureaucracy so I can get around it."

Other problems grew out of the company's inexperience with marketing fruit juices. Distribution was slowed because Campbell—used to being the big boy on the block—refused at first to give direct shipment discounts, and offered supermarkets lower-than-normal price promotions with higher-than-normal volume and advertising requirements. The strategy backfired when stores refused to be bullied: They didn't need Campbell for juice the way they did for soup. "We tried to impose our product without listening," admits Hess, who assumed control of the beverages unit in November 1984. "We shoved it down their throats, and they shoved it right back."

As a result of the delays, marketing blunders, and other problems, JuiceWorks is expected to reach only half the $80 million to $100 million in sales originally projected for 1985. Yet despite losses estimated to be in excess of $4 million, Hess and his team of young managers have been assured of continued corporate support—including a projected $20-million marketing war chest—for the JuiceWorks line.

To a student of large-company behavior, the decision looks like an admirable commitment to a long-term marketing vision. But to a smaller company seeking a sip of the juice business for itself, Campbell's persistence looks like nothing but trouble.

"They have so much money, they can toss those products out in the marketplace without understanding it," says Garry Scaife, vice-president and director of marketing of International Beverage Importers Inc., a tiny Westlake Village, Calif.-based concern that started marketing natural juices in 1980. "Sometimes just throwing money at problems doesn't solve them, but it sure doesn't hurt. Hell, I could probably retire with all the money they've spent learning the business."

Scaife's frustration with Campbell's ability to absorb its blunders is understandable. After selling his previous company, he put together some $300,000 to launch International Beverage. Seeking a marketing ploy to compensate for his limited budget, Scaife called his product Popeye Punch, licensing the trademark from King Features Syndicate. Unable to finance his own manufacturing, he had the new juice supplied by a local packer; as is customary for smaller companies, he sold it through food brokers. But soon his plans began to unravel.

Even as Popeye Punch was being introduced, Libby, Borden, and Campbell entered the same product category. Then came the kind of error a start-up with major competition simply cannot afford. A defect in the punch's blend caused a white ring to form around the edge of each juice bottle. Forced to pull his product off the market, Scaife spent several months looking for another formula, a process that cost him two seasons' worth of orders. Sales for 1984, which he had hoped would hit $2 million, failed to reach the $1-million mark. Losses mounted, and for the time being, Scaife has all but given up trying to penetrate the mass market.

"We have a good product," he complains, "but in many cases we can't even get onto the shelves. I hate hearing the supermarket guy say, 'I'd love to sell your product and I know it will sell, but because Campbell has a million dollars to market JuiceWorks, you don't have a chance.'"

At first glance, Mark Sherman's Today's Taste project appears more misguided than Juice Works ever did—another example of the difficulty giant corporations have breaking into specialized markets. Indeed, Sherman's competitors seem to view it as something of a joke.

"The idea is very creative, but it is not going to work," scoffs Dominique D'Ermo, proprietor of Washington's swank Dominique's Restaurant, who recently branched out into canned gourmet soups. D'Ermo says that Today's Taste dishes—prepared in the early morning hours at a kitchen in Alexandria, Va., and costing as much as $7.95 each—run a high risk of deterioration during their trip to the supermarket. He doesn't believe they will ever achieve the quality demanded by upscale consumers. A Washington Post review echoes this concern, panning Sherman's Pasta Primavera as "gummy enough for any child to turn it to Play-Doh," and commenting that Today's Taste's Chicken Salad Jacques "led you to wish you tasted it yesterday."

"You simply can't industrialize the process like that," agrees Jeffrey Cohen, who maintains a kitchen at each of the two Washington, D.C., area locations of his Sutton Place Gourmet. Cohen credits much of the success of his own operation, which last year grossed some $9 million, to his personal involvement as owner-manager. "It has to come right out of your guts," he says. "You have to be the kind of person who would build his own house to get the view he wanted."

Maybe so. Maybe what Cohen calls "the entrepreneur's touch" is still the absolute key to turning opportunity into gold. But it is also true that entrepreneurs can't afford to be complacent anymore—because whatever happens with Today's Taste, Campbell isn't conceding the specialty-food market to anyone.

From one point of view, Sherman's Washington experience has been a financial and artistic disaster. The return rate on some Today's Taste entrees reached 40%, and losses have been severe. "I would not say it's a successful project," says Herbert Baum, president of Campbell's U.S. divisions. "It's a learning experience we can use for the future."

But use it Campbell will: As with JuiceWorks, the company hasn't been deterred by early failures. With the first trial completed, Sherman is leaving Washington, he will continue as project director, reporting to Marty Buchalski of the refrigerated-foods unit. In six months or so, a revised version of Today's Taste should be ready for another test. And smaller competitors have plenty of reason to fear that Campbell's awesome ability to withstand setbacks—and equally important willingness to adjust products to meet consumer preference—will win out in the long run.

"When you go to the casinos in Atlantic City," says Buchalski, "they have a 2% edge over the customer because they have more money. Well, that's the same with us. We have the wherewithal to keep rolling the dice. The entrepreneur has to put up his house."

SCHOOL PRAYER

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I favor prayer in public schools—but let me be clear as to what I mean by prayer. By its nature, prayer is tied to the beliefs of each religious denomination, and the manner and content of prayer is a fundamental aspect of each person's faith. A prayer general enough to be acceptable to everyone would surely trivialize prayer for many students and make it offensive to others. After all, if prayer can be offensive to some for the words it includes, it can also be offensive to others for the words it omits. That is why I favor establishing a period of silence in our schools; a period in which students can reflect, meditate, or pray in the form and language prescribed by their individual consciences. I advocate a moment of silence during which students could engage in prayer that comes from the heart and from beliefs formed in the home, not a prayer selected by the local school board or superintendent.

I have long advocated and voted for a moment of silence for prayer or meditation at the beginning of each school day, but that is not what the resolution before us today calls for. It is a direct attack on the very basis of our constitutional system and the checks and balances our forefathers so wisely and judiciously included in the Constitution of our courts.

Senate bill 47 would deprive the Supreme Court and all other Federal courts of jurisdiction over any case involving voluntary school prayer, Bible reading, or religious meetings in public schools or public buildings. By doing so, this bill would violate the Constitution's supremacy clause which provides the Supreme Court with the authority to determine the constitutionality of Federal and State laws. By stripping the Supreme Court and the Federal courts of the jurisdiction to hear such cases, S. 47 effectively would allow State courts to ignore Supreme Court decisions and thus prevent this Nation from fulfilling its longstanding goal of creating a uniform rule of law.

While Congress does have the authority to regulate the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as well as the general jurisdiction of other Federal courts, this bill would go beyond to boundaries established by previous court decisions and basic constitutional principles. And I believe it does so intentionally and by design. After all, this bill is being offered because its sponsors know that they cannot muster the two-thirds vote they need in this body to pass a constitutional amendment permitting vocalized prayer in the public schools. So they are trying to get what they want through the back door: Stripping the Supreme Court of its jurisdiction in matters relating to school prayer and claiming that they need only a simple majority of the Senators to do so. But if this measure passes, the flood gates will be open—and we will be inundated by numerous other pieces of legislation seeking to strip the Supreme Court of its jurisdiction over any controversial matter. In short, if a simple majority vote of Congress can overturn decisions arrived at in the courts because lawmakers disagree with those decisions, then any legitimate judicial decision can, and likely will, be imperiled. As one of our leading newspapers put it in closing a recent editorial on this subject: "The Framers of the Constitution provided a perfectly good way to overturn Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution: the amendment process."

But let's not fool ourselves. Court stripping may be the technical issue behind this legislation, but it is not the real issue. The real issue is whether or not we will impose vocalized prayer on the public schoolchildren of this Nation. And while I have always supported our children's right to pray silently anywhere and any time they choose, I have always opposed the institution of organized and vocalized prayer.

I believe organized prayer would violate America's time-honored tradition of separating church and state. In my view, religion should be fostered in our homes, families and churches—but not in those institutions run by the Government. Indeed, I believe that allowing our Government to intrude into religion is the surest way to jeopardize everyone's religious liberty.

Another reason for my stand on organized and vocalized prayer is that I do not believe that any vocalized group prayer can truly be voluntary. Given the strong peer pressure that exists among our youth, it is inescapable that many children would be placed in the awkward position of having to choose between their religious beliefs and their desire to be accepted by their classmates. An 8-year-old Jewish boy from Pittsburgh put it well in a letter he wrote to President Reagan. Recalling that his family had recently lived in another country, the boy wrote:

> In my school we had to say a prayer. Some of the children stood in the hall instead of saying the prayer. Everybody thought they were bad. One boy told me I was going to hell. Please don't make people hate me because I am Jewish. It made me feel terrible to say the prayer.

Mr. President, I am both a Christian and an elder in the Presbyterian Church. I treasure my faith—and I have always cherished the religious freedom that our Constitution provides. But I know that none of us wants to make our children—or our neighbor's children—feel terrible for remaining true to their religious beliefs. And in my view the way to keep that from happening is to urge our children to take their religion to heart and to protect their religious freedom. Allow our children to pray silently if they wish, but do not coerce them into participating in an organized prayer written by school or Government officials.●

TRIBUTE TO HONOR KEN HOWARD

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, on Monday, September 9, 1985, the federalism community lost a good friend and a strong advocate. Ken Howard, former Executive Director of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, died suddenly and unexpectedly in Madison, WI, after suffering a heart attack. He is survived by his wife, Karen, and their five children, David, Mark, Allison, Marcia, and Rebecca.

Ken Howard had a distinguished career which combined both public and private service. He graduated from Northwestern University and received a master's degree and a doctorate in public administration from Cornell University. Most recently, he had departed as Executive Director of the ACIR to become a principal of Chambers Associates. There, he was directing research on the problem of State and local funding of public infrastructure.

His professional accomplishments do not end there. He has held the positions of president of the National Association of State Budget Office during his service to the State of Wisconsin as budget director. He served as vice president of the American Society of Public Administration and would have become its president in 1986.

We who share the belief that the values of federalism are too often overlooked in the public policy process find the loss of one so knowledgeable on intergovernmental relations all the more untimely; for Ken Howard died, just as he was beginning to contribute the most. We shall miss him.●

GRADUATION ADDRESS OF CAPTAIN JOSEPH R. JOHN

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to submit for the RECORD, and for all to read, a recent speech presented by Capt. Joseph R. John, a resident of San Diego.

The occasion of this address was the 1985 graduating class of Central Falls High School in Rhode Island. Captain John was invited to deliver this graduation speech not only because he attended Central Falls High school but also because as a graduate of Annapolis and Harvard, he distinguished himself in service to his country during war and now peace. A patriotic American, Captain John was there also to honor his mother, in whose name the Mrs. Michael John Fund was established upon her death last year, a scholarship that is awarded top students of Central Falls High School.

Mrs. Michael John, an immigrant, saw the nobility and sweetness of this land and the purity of its ideals. She loved her country and was dedicated to her family and had invincible strength in her faith in God.

Her son, Joe John, is made of the same mold, likewise a symbol of the virtues of honesty, fairness and hard work.

It is my belief that others will benefit from his inspiring and scholarly words, and I ask that his remarks may appear in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

GRADUATION SPEECH 1985 CENTRAL FALLS HIGH SCHOOL, CENTRAL FALLS, RI

(By Capt. Joseph R. John)

To be asked to address this fine graduating class of 1985 is a great privilege indeed, ... a singular honor.

It is my understanding that one third of the students at Central Falls High School were born in other parts of the world: The Middle East, Europe, Southeast Asia, South America. When I attended Central Falls High School, the parents of more than half of the students were immigrants. This is a country of immigrants. The first immigrants as we all know, landed in the Mayflower, millions have followed. This ethnic mixture is the richness that makes our country of America unique, and gives us a special source of strength.

Your mothers and fathers understand and appreciate what our country has to offer. As my mother and father worked hard to help me succeed, your parents are working hard to help you succeed. You graduates, your families, your teachers and friends are what truely represent the character and the spirit of Central Falls: This one square mile city, embodies the richness and, the strength, of this extraordinary country.

The ethnic and religious diversity of Central Falls and its hard-working people, underscores the quality of family life, the belief in God and in country, and most particularly . . . . The vital importance of education . . .; this country's greatest asset . . . . President James Madison stated, "Knowledge will forever govern ignorance," with an education, you can open doors others will never even see.

My remarks this evening will focus on how education, country, and God, play a critical roll in enriching the quality of your life.

This evening, you are completing a stage of life, the commencement is just that; a beginning. You may think you've finished, but all the work behind you, is just the foundation on which to build your future. Whether it be: a job, college, a career, the military service, a family. Why it's enough to make you wish you had missed taking your final exam.

The word "graduation" means "step". This moment in your life is a stepping stone, and for many of you I trust, a step toward more education. These 12 years of education mean more than you realize.

A year before I graduated from CFHS, a guest speaker, Lt. Col. Chappie James, made a lasting impression on me. I shall never forget him, nor his words. Chappie James was a black man, born in Pensacola, Florida in 1920. By persistence and hard work, he earned his college degree in 1942. He then obtained his commission as a second lieutenant in the Army. He flew 101 combat missions in Korea; received the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce award in 1954. Lt. Col. James spoke to us here in 1955, a year when Dwight D. Eisenhower was President and a year when we in Central Falls were listening to the music of Elvis Presley.

Subsequently he flew 78 combat missions in Vietnam: And was with a flight that shot down 7 Mig 21's, the highest total of any mission in Vietnam. He received the Freedom Foundation Medal on two occasions: in 1967, and again in 1968. In 1969 he was the recipient of the Outstanding Jaycee Award. In 1975 he was the first black to be promoted to four star rank: General Chappie James was given command of the North American Defense Command and of the U.S. and Canadian Defense Force in 1975. He retired and passed away in February 1978.

General James was widely known for his speeches on Americanism and patriotism, for which he was editorialized in numerous national and international publications.

He stated: "My mother used to say: 'Don't stand there banging on the door of opportunity, then when someone opens it, you say, "wait a minute, I've got to get my bags." You be prepared with your bag of knowledge, your patriotism, your honor, and when somebody opens that door, you charge in.'"

During the period when he was growing up, he was often discriminated against, people tried to knock him down, but he would come back fighting.

When others complained—he used to say, "I am, above all else, an American." Chappie James encouraged us to believe strongly in individual initiative and plain, old fashioned hard work.

To better ourselves by getting an education. He told us to shoot for the stars: and I would hope that you graduates would be as impressed as I was, by such determination and grit, nothing in the world can take the place of persistence and hard work.

Talent will not: nothing is more common than men and women with talent who fail to achieve success. I would tell each graduate not to be a quitter, I would tell each graduate to be persistent, to work hard, to believe in yourself.

I'm reminded of the story several years ago about a remarkable baseball pitcher, Bobo Newsom in the third inning of a key game, his manager called for time, and walked out to the pitcher's mound. "Bobo, I've got some sad news," he said. "Your father just died suddenly. I'm taking you out of the game."

There was a pause.

Very slowly, and with determination, Bobo Newsom, who was very close to his father, said: "Please, don't take me out of this game." The manager agreed, and Bobo went on to pitch one of the most remarkable games of his career, all the while, with tears in his eyes.

After the game, the manager asked Bobo how he could pitch under such tragic and sad circumstances. Bobo replied, "If my dad thought for one minute that I was a quitter, he would have died 20 years ago."

In order to better yourself, to excel you must be persistent and hard-working—whether it is to learn a skill like Bobo Newsom's or to use your own initiative to improve your education, like Chappie James.

The challenges that lie ahead for the human race will be met by thousands of bright, stalwart young men and women like youselves in whose minds are locked the ability and the creativeness to astound the world with bold new ideas. As Edison, Lindberg, Einstein, Neil Armstrong, and others have done before you.

America isn't great because of what our Government has done for people, America is great because of what our Government has permitted a free people to do for themselves.

Patriotism is a form of celebration. It is a sign of robust spirit, a sound self confidence, a sure sense of duty, a healthy confidence in doing well.

America is a great power and yet we have read in history that other great powers such as Rome declined and lost their greatness. We have learned that barbarians conquered Rome. The truth is, that Rome fell from an erosion of intelligence, and a decrease in articulate leadership and vision, because the brilliant emperors, senators, and their colleagues, produced increasingly fewer brilliant sons to lead Rome.

Rome fell, from a decrease in available bright, literate leadership. Our nation, our culture, depends upon wise, articulate, literate, sound judgment. We can no more survive with a deficient leadership than Rome did. And our leadership, ultimately is the citizenry.

You, and others like you, are the future of this noble country—what you do now—what you accomplish—will determine our direction in the next century. Think about it—man lives approximately 25,000 days. You have already lived 7,000 days on the average.

Yesterday—is a memory.

Tomorrow—is a dream.

Today—is reality.

Reality is the bridge between yesterday and tomorrow. What contribution will you make in life—in this brief time?

You must make a contribution to mankind. Whether it is the task of raising good, law abiding children, writing a great novel, or walking on the moon. I urge you to strive with persistence and hard work, with moral principles make your mark. Socrates said, "An unexamined life is not worth living."

Have you thought of the purpose of your life? George Bernard Shaw states: "Indifference is the essence of inhumanity."

Do you have; will you show, concern for your fellow man? In the Proverbs, it states: "When there is no dream, the people will perish."

Why settle for simple dreams, shoot for the stars. "Not to decide, is to decide." "How will you examine your life? Will you make a rational contribution?" Are you aware that, in the past, Central Falls has provided us with: U.S. Senators, Congressmen, cardinals, bishops, scholars, military leaders, business leaders, outstanding athletes, and many others who have gone on to achieve greatness?

Achievement is the knowledge that you have studied and worked hard and have done the best that is in you. Success has been defined as earning the praise of others, and . . . that praise is flattering, too. But it is not as important and as satisfying. As achievement . . . Always aim for achievement and forget about success. Success will naturally follow achievement.

Each graduate has a "choice", you have a "free will." You can be a force for good, or you can choose another path: The path of self-interest, the exploitation of others. America needs alert and sober men and women to wrestle with the vexing social and moral problems of our times.

My mother, for whom the "Mrs. Michael John Scholarship" is named, like so many other immigrants—like many of you, and your parents, saw the nobility and the sweetness of this land, the purity of its ideals.

America gave my mother the finest opportunity, the greatest joy of realizing a well-spent life in the glow of her family, in the celebrated freedoms of her adopted country of America, and in the invincible strength of her faith in God. She instilled these virtues in those of us who knew her. She was optimistic and she encouraged us always to work for good.

You graduates have lived these first 7,000 days. They are gone and will never return. What are you going to do with the remaining 18,000 days? Will you use them: Soberly? Productively? Honorably?

In service to your family, to your country, to God? Or will you go another way? You have to choose. You have the power of "free will." The time is upon each of you now at this commencement, this graduation. At this crucial "step" you are taking this evening.

Our nature still contains both good and bad—but the stakes and the risks increase with every generation. So, I'm going to ask a few things of you: study carefully both the benefits and the liabilities of what we pass on to you.

And keep a sharp eye on what your political leaders are doing. Let them hear your views on issues. Your generation will shape the course of our next century. Don't leave anything behind for which you would be hesitant to take credit and give credit for what is right with this country.

Today, despite our problems, we have more food per mouth, more clothes per body, more homes per family, more wages per worker, and more opportunities per dream, than any people that ever lived. But we must continue to work together, to be grateful for what we have. Instead of tearing down, build upon this foundation, of 12 years of education, because its important to the future of our country.

We need the attitude expressed in this closing poem: I saw them tearing a building down, a gang of men in a dusty room, with a yo heave ho and a lusty yell, they swung a beam and the side wall fell.

I asked the foreman if those men were as skilled as the men he'd hire if he were to build. He laughed and said, "Oh no indeed, common labor is all I need for those men can wreck in a day or two what builders had taken years to do."

I asked myself as I went my way, what kind of role am I to play? Am I the builder who builds with care? Measuring life by the rule and square? Or am I the wrecker who walks the town content with the role of tearing down?

And so graduates, march forward with cautious optimism . . . Grasp your diploma tightly, as a symbol of commitment to a goal America needs the type of builders and patriots each of you can be. Your place in this procession confirms that you are on your way.

I salute each one of you, and your families.

Good luck, best wishes, and God bless you.●

EXTENSION OF MEDICARE HOSPICE BENEFITS FOR ANOTHER 3 YEARS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise in support of legislation, S. 777, to extend hospice benefits under the Medicare Program for 3 more years. My distinguished colleague, Mr. HEINZ, chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, has proposed this legislation in an effort to accommodate the needs of the most critically ill individuals of this country. I commend him for his efforts, and I lend him my full support in the endeavor.

The Hospice Program began as a grassroots, volunteer movement to compassionately care for terminally ill individuals. Interested and active individuals joined in a collective effort to address an issue that neither Government nor private industry previously had confronted—how to deal with the emotional and physical strains of terminally ill individuals and their families. With little funding and ad hoc administration, their efforts represent the core of charity and activism that has made this country great.

Hospice has grown and developed into a large interdisciplinary network. In some locations, hospice is entirely a volunteer, family and patient support program. In others, hospice has expanded into a larger operation—providing supportive, medical, and home care services. Regardless of what specific services a particular hospice offers, all hospices believe in the importance of meeting the needs of the terminally ill patient. With this goal in mind, hospices work together to provide a quality of service for a specialized group of individuals that is unmatched by any other kind of governmental or private effort.

Hospice also boasts of a significantly cost-effective operation. Major insurance carriers recognized the benefit of hospice a long time ago. The Federal Government was the last organization to recognize the effectiveness and efficiency of hospice services. However, CBO has confirmed what the private sector learned years ago. Hospice not only provides a service that otherwise is not provided, but it also saves a lot of money.

CBO projected that Medicare savings between 1982 and 1987 would amount to close to $100 million. With the huge Federal deficit, it does not make sense to overlook the significant cost savings of this program. While some optional medical services only provide opportunities for compounded medical treatment and, consequently, require additional Federal spending, the Medicare hospice benefit saves money. The nature of the program and the way the program is administered eliminate the possibility of Hospice becoming an extra expense. It serves as a needed worthwhile, and cost-effective approach to dealing with a seriously ill group of people.

Terminally ill individuals and their families deserve the special treatment and support that regular health care services do not provide. It is my belief that our Government was designed to help individuals who need immediate help. I ask my colleagues to consider this thought and to reaffirm our responsibility to these individuals by supporting this legislation.●

DR. HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I note with sorrow the recent passing of a distinguished native of New York, and a distinguished American—Dr. Herbert Scoville, Jr. a graduate of the University of Rochester, Dr. Scoville, was trained as a physical chemist. As such, he devoted much of his life to public service in the area of strategic weapons and arms control. He was the author of two books on nuclear issues: "Missile Madness" and "MX: Prescription for Disaster." For his efforts in increasing awareness of the importance of arms control Dr. Scoville received the Rockefeller Public Service Award in 1981.

As we recognize the 40th anniversary of the first, and hopefully the last, use of nuclear arms, public concern for control of nuclear weapons mounts. Dr. Scoville was concerned on a daily basis. I hope his thoughtful concern shall continue to inform us all, and guide us.

Mr. President, I ask that Dr. Scoville's obituary published in the New York Times be printed in the RECORD so others might learn of this fine American's life and perhaps join in his concern.

The obituary follows:

[From the New York Times, July 31, 1985]

HERBERT SCOVILLE JR., ARMS EXPERT; BECAME A CRITIC OF NUCLEAR POLICY

(By Neil A. Lewis)

WASHINGTON, July 30.—Herbert Scoville Jr., an authority in advanced military technologies who helped develop nuclear weapons and then, in the 1960's, became an articulate advocate of arms control, died today. He was 70 years old.

Dr. Scoville, who died at the Georgetown University Hospital, succumbed to cancer, according to the family.

Since 1979, Herbert (Pete) Scoville served as the president of the Arms Control Association, a private organization he had helped found.

Earlier, in Government service, he helped develop nuclear weapons as technical director of the Defense Department's Armed Forces Special Weapons Project from 1948 to 1955. He served as deputy director for research and technology in the Central Intelligence Agency from 1955 to 1963, and then as assistant director for science and technology in the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency until 1969.

PREPARED ARMS CONTROL PACTS

In the arms control post, he was responsible for developing positions on such matters as the 1963 treaty on a limited nuclear test ban, the 1969 treaty aimed at curbing the spread of nuclear weapons and the strategic arms limitation talks with the Soviet Union.

Since leaving Government service in 1969, he was a ubiquitous figure in the public debate over nuclear disarmament, new technologies in the arms field and United States relations with the Soviet Union concerning nuclear weaponry. A major theme of his work, according to associates, was that the key to nuclear stability lay in negotiations between the superpowers.

A native of New York City and a physical chemist by training, with a Ph.D. from the University of Rochester, Dr. Scoville was responsible for the technical aspects of espionage when he worked for the C.I.A., developing intelligence with satellites and high-flying planes.

CHANGE OF VIEWS IN C.I.A. SERVICE

At the C.I.A., associates said, he became convinced of the need to control nuclear weaponry. In 1958, he attended an international conference to discuss the possibility of a surprise nuclear attack and later wrote of the "oppressive weight" he and many participants felt about the obligation to do something to prevent the use of weapons that could destroy mankind.

After his stint with the Arms Control Agency, he devoted himself entirely to an effort to disseminate information about nuclear weapons, possible strategies for controlling them and the consequences of failing to do so.

In 1981, when he received the Rockefeller Public Service Award that is administered by Princeton University, he was cited for "mobilizing his energies, his scientific knowledge, and his political insight in an effort to create a public awareness of the importance of arms control to American and international security."

Dr. Scoville, who walked with a set of canes because of arthritis, was a familiar figure on Capitol Hill where his expertise was sought on the whole range of nuclear issues.

He was the author of "Missile Madness," a primer on nuclear war, published in 1970, and of "MX: Prescription for Disaster," in 1981.

In recent years, he took up the Reagan Administration on several issues, notably on whether a nuclear freeze could be verified and on the usefulness of the space-based defense program popularly known as "Star Wars." Dr. Scoville argued that it would be destabilizing and could violate the 1972 Antiballistic Missile Treaty.

Dr. Scoville is survived by his wife, the former Ann Curtiss of McLean, Va., and Taconic, Conn.; three sons, Anthony and Thomas, both of Washington, and Nicholas of Los Angeles, and a daughter, Molly Fitzmaurice of Washington.

The funeral will be private, but there will be a memorial service here sometime in September, according to the family.●

TRIBUTE TO A UNION PIONEER: BARBARA J. EASTERLING

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, on July 16, Barbara J. Easterling achieved a milestone in American labor history when she was elected as the first female national officer of the Communications Workers of America.

I take special pride in this accomplishment because Ms. Easterling has long been active in organized labor and in public affairs in Ohio. Indeed, she has been a member of the CWA local in Akron for 33 years.

Although Ms. Easterling's most recent attainment is exceptional, it is not the first time she has broken new ground in her career. She was the first woman ever elected to serve as vice president of the Ohio AFL-CIO. Also, she served a 4-year term as the only labor member of the Advisory Board on Education and Training to the Secretary of the Navy, a White House appointment.

Mr. President, earlier, in 1971, Barbara Easterling was appointed by John Gilligan, then Governor of Ohio, to serve as chief of the State's industrial relations labor division. That administrative unit of government is empowered to enforce Ohio's labor laws.

In addition, Ms. Easterling served as administrative assistant to CWA Vice President Marty Hughes in Ohio from 1978 to 1980. In August 1980, she was selected by then CWA President Glenn E. Watts to come to Washington and serve as his assistant.

Mr. President, Barbara Easterling comes from a family of dedicated trade unionists. I extend my congratulations to them in this special moment of celebration, and I wish this outstanding daughter of Ohio all the best as she embarks on what I am sure will be stimulating and challenging duties.●

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having conferred with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Friday, September 13, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATORS PROXMIRE AND MOYNIHAN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order on tomorrow, there be two special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senator PROXMIRE and Senator MOYNIHAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 10:45 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President upon completion of routine morning business tomorrow, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1200, the immigration bill, turning to the pending amendment by Senator HAWKINS.

At the conclusion of that, Senator KENNEDY will proceed with his amendments. There are several other identified amendments.

Rollcall votes can be expected throughout the Friday session; but I share with colleagues the belief that we could finish in midafternoon, with some degree of reasonable projection, which may quickly slip away.

That is my review; and if the minority leader has any inquiry to make and I can respond, I will try to do so.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. I do not have any questions.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the Democratic leader if he has further business.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader. I have no further business.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m., Friday, September 13, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and at 8:33 p.m., the Senate recessed until Friday, September 13, 1985, at 10 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY: IN CELEBRATION OF DEMOCRACY

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a speech by one of my constituents, Miss Eleni Chamis, a first generation American of Greek ancestry. Her speech was inspired by her study of the ancient Greeks and a visit to her forefathers homelands.

The ancient Greeks, of course, are unmatched as an inspiration of song and verse. Their contributions to modern Western thought in philosophy, art, science, religion, and law are renowned. It can truthfully be said that all Americans, whether or not of Greek ancestry, are kinsmen of a kind to the ancient Greeks, in whose age was born the concept of democracy. It is constitutional democracy, after all, which has made possible the American way of life and enabled the United States to emerge as the greatest and most powerful nation of our age.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to solicit support for a resolution I recently introduced, House Joint Resolution 381, to mark the anniversary of Greek Independence Day on March 25, 1986, and every March 25 thereafter. The political relationship between our Government and the Greek Government today is somewhat strained. A joint celebration of Greek Independence Day would serve to reaffirm our common commitment to the democratic principles and the struggle for freedom from which our nations sprang. Moreover, it would strengthen our natural ties and reinvigorate the relations between our two nations.

HERITAGE, CULTURE, TRADITION

This is what our ancestors have passed down to us . . . our past, our history. What Greece has given us is the voice of justice ringing loud and strong. Greece has given us:

Herodotus, the father of history;

Hippocrates, the father of medicine;

Homer, the insurmountable poet and second-to-none analyst of human emotions;

Socrates, the model of respect for the laws, and the wisest and most unselfish of all teachers;

Plato, the sweetest philosophical personality;

Aristotle, the most profound mind of all time, who bestowed upon us the history of philosophy, botanology, anatomy, the fundamentals of logic, and the definitions of truth and judgement;

Solon, the father of law:

Pericles, the father of democracy;

Pythagoras, who laid the basis for higher mathematics;

Alexander, the great civilizer;

The epic of Marathon;

The Supreme Court, the highest instrument of all human justice possible;

The Rostrum of Pnyx, an unshakeable foundation of free speech;

The Parthenon, the supreme wonder of art. Not even a perfect imitation could have the same impact of this great accomplishment;

The Holy Bible in its absolute perfection;

The Divine Music of the Church which "lifts the fallen and helps him to face the spiritual dawn";

Chrysostom, Christianity's greatest apologist; and the Grecian Philosophers for whom Jesus, on being informed that they were asking for an audience, proclaimed, "Now hath come the time for the Son of God to be glorified."

Will Durant wrote "All civilized nations in all that concerns the activity of the intellect, are colonies of Hellas" today. Through Greece and her history, our heritage has gained: our handicrafts; the processes of trade, industry, finance, and commerce; the techniques of mining; the essentials of engineering; the monotheistic idea; a democratic government; a trial by jury; civil liberties; our schools and universities; our stadiums; our athletics and Olympic Games; the conceptions of self-containment and self-control; Christian theology and practice; our literature; our alphabet and language; our literary genres: the ode, the novel, the essay, the oration, the history, the biography, and the drama; our chants and music; our sculptures and architecture . . . a whole world of knowledge.

Lord Byron was inspired to write in "Don Juan" when he stood atop the mountain, Marathon, filled with sadness and nostalgia in human history.

"The mountains look on Marathon—
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free;
For standing on the Persians' grave.
I could not dream myself a slave."

On my trip to Greece last summer, I saw my heritage very much alive. I walked the same soil of Socrates, of Pericles, of Alexander. I sat on the mountain of the Pnyx and watched the "Sound and Light" show, which recreated Pericles' speech to the Athenians, the "marathon" run, the invasion of Greece by the Persians, and the burning of the Parthenon. On the way to Karpenisi to visit my mother's village, which she hadn't seen for forty years, I was sidetracked by a large "pazári." There were lambs skewing, merchants selling, people laughing, talking, and dancing.

In Athens, I watched the Evzones at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier change guards every hour on the hour. I climbed the magnificent mountain of the Acropolis and gazed at the Parthenon, the most stupendous piece of architecture ever contructed. I strolled up the steep side of Mount Lycavetos to stare down on the most historical city in all the world.

Edith Hamilton writes in The Greek Way, "Of all that the Greeks did only a very small part has come down to us and we have no means of knowing if we have their best. It would be strange if we had . . . no sculpture comparable to theirs; no buildings ever more beautiful; no writings superior. We have only the ruin of what was; the world has had no more than that for well on two thousand years; yet these remains of the mighty structure are among our possessions today which we value as most precious."

"But in that antique world of Egypt and the early Asiatic civilizations, that world where the pendulum was swinging ever farther and farther away from all fact, something completely new happened. The Greeks came into being and the world as we know it, began."

This is my heritage and yours.

H.J. RES. 381

Whereas the ancient Greeks developed the concept of democracy, in which the supreme power to govern was vested in the people;

Whereas the Founding Fathers of the United States of America drew heavily upon the political and philosophical experience of ancient Greece in forming our representative democracy;

Whereas March 25, 1986, marks the one-hundred-and-sixty-fifth anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire;

Whereas these and other ideals have forged a close bond between our two nations and their peoples; and

Whereas it is proper and desirable to celebrate with the Greek people, and to reaffirm the democratic principles from which our two great nations sprang: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 25, 1986, and each March 25 thereafter, is designated "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy", and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

CASE FOR THE RELIEF OF WAYNE GREENFIELD

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing today a bill for the relief of a constituent of mine, Wayne Greenfield, of Pacific Grove, CA, who I believe is entitled to compensation for losses he has suffered as a result of actions of the Bureau of Land Management in the Department of the Interior.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member of the Senate on the floor.

Boldface type indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

On October 25, 1965, Mr. Greenfield purchased 22½ acres of land from a private party. The boundaries of the purchased property were estabiished by a Bureau of Land Management survey in 1963 and were duly recorded in the appropriate county courthouse in California. On October 21, 1974, Mr. Greenfield purchased 42½ acres of land by bid from a superior court sale of private property. Again, the boundaries of the property were based on the 1963 Bureau of Land Management survey. In 1979, the Bureau of Land Management resurveyed the property in question which resulted in the loss of approximately 5 acres of Mr. Greenfield's property. The lost property had a value of about $20,000, including timber and land value, and the value of two active springs. As a result of the same survey, Mr. Greenfield acquired some additional land. However, this land was worth only $5,000, leaving Mr. Greenfield with an unfair loss in land value of about $15,000.

I believe that Mr. Greenfield's loss is due to the results of mistaken actions by the Bureau of Land Management, and that his case warrants the pursuit of private legislation to redress his loss. I urge my colleagues to grant him the necessary relief.

H.R. —

A Bill for the relief of Wayne Greenfield

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Wayne Greenfield of Pacific Grove, California, the sum of $15,000 in full settlement of all claims of Wayne Greenfield against the United States for damages caused by an incorrect survey by the Bureau of Land Management of the Department of the Interior.

COURAGEOUS BANKERS IN MONTANA

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, the crisis in agriculture continues to burden America, but through this crisis has come a strengthened alliance between farmer and banker.

We have a tremendous number of banks in Montana and elsewhere that have displayed the fortitude and courage to stick with customers. These bankers—who are suffering through the farm crisis along with agriculture producers—deserve commendations and encouragement and I would hope the Federal Reserve gives these banks the flexibility and incentives necessary to remain steadfast behind agricultural America.

I urge my colleagues to read the following letter from a banker in Terry, MT, who describes with compassion and intelligence the relationship between banker and farmer. It is a relationship built on trust, and I'm gratified to see that trust remains strong even through these current tough times.

It is with great pleasure I enclose this letter from Al Brubaker, president of the State Bank of Terry, and hope other farm banks and bankers will use the sentiment expressed here as role model until profit is restored to agriculture.

The letter follows:

JULY 19, 1985.

Hon. RON MARLENEE,
Congressman from Montana,
Washington, DC.

DEAR RON: This morning in the daily paper headlines were hundreds of millions of money being pumped into the agricultural credit banks to revitalize them after all their agricultural lending problems.

In all the furor and noise about Ag Lendi, and Ag problems there seems to be little thought given to the fact that there are a lot of us small banks scattered over the country who have been spending our lives and what money we have in building and operating institutions where practically our entire business is with agricultural operation or its related businesses. We have been during this time attempting to keep our customers going in adverse as well as good times. Many times we do this against our better judgment but knowing that our customers financial existence may depend on us. The end result that any number of banks are taking tremendous losses, some with complete loss of the bank. This has been accented in our area as well as yours because of continuing drought and insect invasion that no one could foresee or predict.

Now we and there are hundreds of us sit and wonder where in hell it is all going to end up. Other than the media which is like a wolf waiting for a dying steer for news of a bank closing no one pays a hell of a lot of attention to our plight. Our main street customers are going broke and in many cases the banks are taking heavy losses trying to shore them up. Our Ag land is losing its value and we have little if any production to market. A lot of the cattle are going to be sacrificed at a minimal price and it will cost a hell of a lot more to replace them if it ever does get back to normal in the drought area.

Do you sense why I am writing. Who in hell is worring about the banks that are trying to carry thru in the horrible mess.

Thanks for listening.

Sincerely,

AL BRUBAKER, President.

THE 100TH BIRTHDAY OF SARASOTA, FL

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, Sarasota, FL, the City of the Arts, part of my congressional district, will celebrate its 100th birthday in a centennial party that will last from November 1985 through April 1986. The timeframe coincides with the November 1885 arrival in the Sarasota area of Scottish, English, and American shareholders of the Florida Mortgage and Investment Co.

Although Sarasota was already sparsely inhabited prior to 1885, the Scots are generally credited with building the town.

Excerpts from early newspapers reveal that the early settlers were industrious. A July 8, 1886, report said:

Fifty to one hundred men have built since the first part of December 1885 (when they began) one hotel, one large store, one blacksmith shop, three boarding houses, one wharf and wharf house, one fish and oyster house, two new store buildings and twenty-three building houses.

The Scots had their priorities in order, according to this April 1, 1886, newspaper report: "Sarasota has organized a yacht club, and has over $200 subscribed for a boat house."

Commerce was vital to the early settlers. The Main Street dock was one of the first construction projects. It was necessary because all supplies were delivered to Sarasota via barges and boats.

Sarasota's tropical beauty reminded some travel writers of Europe and drew international visitors. It is that international influence that makes Sarasota different from other Southern communities.

In addition to the early Scot settlers, Sarasota was influenced by John Ringling from Europe and Mrs. Potter Palmer from Chicago. The circus people that Ringling brought in came from all over the world, and their influence makes Sarasota unique.

Special events are planned for each month of the formal celebration and include a Scottish parade, a formal Centennial Ball, a Ringling Brothers Circus parade, the re-premiere of "The Greatest Show on Earth," an international folk fair and coordination of the centennial with the annual Medieval Fair.

I would like to thank all the people who are participating in the celebration of Sarasota's 100th birthday. It thrills me to see the way our citizens are honoring their fine city and those who founded her and I am very proud to be their representative here in Washington.

CHARLESTON VIETNAM VET RECALLS HIS HOMECOMING

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, as you know, this Nation recently observed both the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II and the 10th anniversary of the end of American involvement in the Vietnam war. Much was said about these events and the people whose lives were affected by the wars. During the month of August, when we were all back in our districts, I came across an article in my local paper which greatly impressed me. In this article Mr. W.M. "Buddy" Milligan, a resident of Charleston and a retired Marine aviator, recalled his homecoming as he returned from Vietnam. Below, I have inserted a copy of Buddy's comments for the consideration of my colleagues. I think you will find his comments inspiring.

CHARLESTON VIETNAM VET RECALLS HIS HOMECOMING

As a veteran myself, I have been slowly burning inside to write a letter to our news media concerning the Vietnam War anniversary and the Vietnam veterans. Last night while watching the local evening news on the 40th anniversary of V.J. Day I decided to quit procrastinating and vent my frustrations.

Two men, one a World War II vet and the other a Vietnam War vet, were being interviewed by one of our local news media personalities. The WWII vet explained how he returned to a hero's welcome from a grateful nation. The Vietnam War vet said that he was not even given a warm welcome and that he was made to feel ashamed to wear his uniform. Once again that same old rhetoric that we have been hearing for several years. Nobody thanked us, nobody appreciated what we did, afraid or ashamed to wear the uniform, we wasted our time in S.E. Asia and on and on. Well I don't know where this person returned to when he got back to the state, but I would be willing to bet it wasn't Charleston, S.C.

I would like to relay to the reading public my experiences. It was a warm April day in 1969 when a planeload of Vietnam veterans from all branches of the service touched down at El Toro Marine Corps Air Station, California. I was a young Marine aviator, having flown over 200 combat missions of which 104 were over North Vietnam. I had also spent the last four months of my tour serving as an advisor to the local Vietnamese district chief. I had a squad of Marines who, along with doctors and corpsmen, helped provide medical and dental assistance to the Vietnamese populace, as well as assisting the local government in establishing schools and adult education programs. It was sometimes dangerous but always rewarding work. Since I have been involved in combat many times both in the air and on the ground I feel that I can speak with knowledge and sincerity at least about my experiences and feelings about that unfortunate war. In any case, we had been flying for well over 12 hours with only a brief refueling stop in Hawaii. We were all tired but excited. As we began to exit from the Boeing 707 a tremendous ovation was heard coming from the tarmac. The local Marine and Navy dependents had spread a brief red carpet leading from the ramp and extending several feet. They stood on each side cheering us as we walked down the red carpet. It was absolutely the most gratifying feeling I could ever describe. It may not have been a ticker tape parade down Broadway, but the lump in our throats were there nonetheless. I will always be grateful for that warm American welcome as long as I live.

However, my welcome did not end there. I called my wife from the Long Beach Airport and told her that I would be home at 1:30 the next morning, which was the first flight out. The plane landed on a rainy spring night. I got to the doorway and looked down to see 14 members of my family and close friends at the bottom of the ramp. Of course I was sure that my immediate family would be there, but I had some great friends there also. They all, family and friends, made me feel like a king. It was a real hero's welcome and I've never pretended to be a hero. But my welcome did not stop there either. The next several days my phone was constantly ringing. My good friend Frank Renau gave me the keys to his beach house on the Isle of Palms for as long as my wife and I and our 2-year-old son, who is now a freshman football player at the Citadel, would like to stay. Thanks again Frank. Everywhere I went in Charleston I was given a warm welcome. When I went into the friendly tavern on Grove St. I had to put my money away because I was a Vietnam vet. I would like to say two things to all of my family and friends: Thank you from the bottom of my heart and God bless you all.

It would be fruitless for me to try and analyze the Vietnam War and its aftermath. Experts have tried and failed miserably in their attempts to do so. We constantly hear about the war we lost. I do not know how we can say we lost the war when we won all the major battles. The military certainly did not lose the war. The politicians gave it away at our last major battle—the one at the conference table. I think the news media have exhausted the issue. In fact, after watching that pitiful interview last night, I know they have.

I am also tired of the constantly whining Vietnam vet who is still waiting for the government or somebody to do something for him because the war "messed him up." The majority of us came back to lead productive lives. We are forging ahead to continue to make this nation the greatest in the history of mankind. My heart goes out to those who did not come back and to their families. They were the real heroes; they gave all they had—their lives.

I would like to end this letter by saying I am proud to be a Charlestonian; I am proud of my family and friends. I am proud to have served under Gen. William Westmoreland and last, but certainly not least, I am proud to have been called a United States Marine.

W.M. "BUDDY" MILLIGAN,
Charleston.

FUTURE COURSE OF SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, although the budget battle for fiscal year 1986 is over, the debate over the future course of the Small Business Administration and its lending programs is not. In fact, the mere freeze enacted by the House and Senate Small Business Committees is essentially an effort to buy time until Congress decides which direction to lead the SBA into the future.

One thing is certain like the budget in general, Congress must set small business priorities. But that entails an understanding of the needs of the small business sector. If small business is to continue its status as a leader in growth and innovation, greater focus must be given to those businesses which produce a net benefit to the economy. The redistribution of scarce credit had its good intentions 30 years ago. But with today's more competitive and fast-changing market, small business requires less Government interference in credit markets and more sensitivity to the need for startup capital, regulatory relief, and a strong and vibrant economy in which to compete.

As the following article in the September 1985 issue of Dun's Business Month points out, Congress needs to make clearly defined distinctions between nondynamic small businesses and those on the cutting edge of our economy. In particular, it is new business which is the key to economic growth. As the author instinctively points out, "* * * governments looking for growth and innovation would be well advised to reduce the barriers facing the businesses of tomorrow."

SMALL BUSINESS: MYTH AND REALITY

(By Marc Levinson)

In the American pantheon, the small businessman is a major god. Entrepreneurs are our folk heroes, and politicians of all stripes praise the little firm as the source of jobs and innovation. Next August, a White House conference, mandated by Congress in the face of Administration opposition, will give Washington the opportunity to show its concern for small business in an election year. As President Reagan has said, "Historically, small business has provided much of the growth in jobs and innovation as well as being the supplier of services and deliverer of goods to virtually every farm, village, town and city in our nation."

Small business is assuming an increasing important role in the U.S. economy. Nearly 29% of the 2.25 million jobs created this year will be in firms with fewer than twenty employees, and more than half will be in firms with fewer than 100, according to Dun & Bradstreet data. From 1976 to 1983 more than 6.2 million jobs were created in small companies. New business incorporations in 1984 set a record of 634,000—twice the number of a decade earlier.

The dynamic nature of these small companies increases the efficiency of the economy. They promote growth not only by filling new economic needs, but also by going out of business when they can no longer compete. This survival of the fittest ensures that only the most efficient enterprises endure. At the same time, new entrants into markets dominated by corporate giants force the big firms to keep their costs in line and their prices competitve.

Nevertheless, the mythology about small business has far out distanced the reality. Some small businesses are budding large businesses, but the reality is that the overwhelming majority will always be small. And while the mythology correctly points to small business as the great source of innovation and new technology, the fact is that only a handful of small businesses are innovators. Says Marjorie Odle, a consultant to the Small Business Administration, "People tend to lump all small businesses together as if they were the same. But small businesses don't necessarily have much in common. You need to look at individual sectors, not at small business as a whole."

To put the contribution of small companies in perspective, it is important to examine the recent spurt of new small business formations against the background of basic changes in the American economy since the mid-1970s. These include:

The booming service sector. Employment in services has grown twice as fast as overall employment over the last decade, and 97% of service firms have fewer than 100 employees. Some 55% of service workers are in small firms, compared to only one in four manufacturing workers.

Deregulation. The restrictions, which once kept small firms from entering many industries, are largely gone, and new competitors abound. More than 13,000 trucking companies have started since deregulation in 1980. Since the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978, small commuter carriers have filled the gaps left when the end of government subsidies led larger carriers to abandon services. Deregulation of long-distance telephone service created a new industry of communications consultants who help firms find the cheapest way to call. In broadcasting, regulatory changes have allowed hundreds of low-power television stations to compete with the full-power stations usually controlled by major corporations. "The average low-power TV station has about seven employees," says consultant John Kompas. While the number of businesses started rose 11.1% from 1980 to 1983, the number of starts in deregulated industries grew 24.8%.

Changing economies of scale. The fervor of the past twenty years for mergers and integrated production has been reversed as business has learned that bigger is not necessarily better. Larger manufacturers increasingly subcontract work to smaller firms in order to lower labor costs and overhead and to gain the flexibility to switch suppliers. Greyhound Corp., the country's largest bus operator, is franchising some routes to entrepreneurs who can run them more efficiently. Says Greyhound Senior Vice President William McCracken, "We don't have any benefits from being so large, and there may be some disadvantages."

Technological change. "Mini mills," some with fewer than 100 workers, can underprice major steel manufacturers since the introduction of sophisticated small-scale equipment. Computerized typesetting has eliminated many production steps for periodicals. Word processors increase the efficiency of office workers, enabling small firms to accomplish as much as large ones used to.

High unemployment. Many new businesses are formed by workers who have lost jobs. That is one reason the number of firms with fewer than twenty employees soared from 1980 to 1982, while the number of larger firms declined.

Immigration. Legal immigration, which averaged about 400,000 people a year in the early 1970s, has run close to 600,000 annually since 1976, while uncounted illegal immigrants have entered the country. No statistics are available, but some experts believe the number of new businesses formed in areas such as New York and Los Angeles has increased due to immigration.

There is little doubt that small businesses are important in increasing competition, and they continue to provide a chance for the ambitious entrepreneur to make a mark. They may also reduce the severity of recessions, since they often adjust to hard times by cutting wages and hours rather than by laying off workers, as larger firms tend to. Nevertheless, the contribution of small business in the economy is frequently overstated.

Contrary to popular belief, corporations with more than 500 workers are still the major source of work in America, employing almost half the private-sector workforce. True, small businesses have created the majority of new jobs in recent years, but their relative performance owes less to the achievements of entrepreneurs than to the woes of large manufacturers. The nagging unemployment rate, which has been hanging at 7.3% for six months, reflects the troubles of the big industrial companies, which are operating at 80% of capacity. Observes Marjorie Odle: "Small buisnesses' share of new jobs depends upon how big business is performing. The share of jobs created is a much-touted statistic, but it really isn't very significant."

Since many small businesses have short life spans and are never counted in government statistics, it is difficult to find accurate data on small business employment. To determine employment growth, researchers must track millions of individual firms over time, often using information that cannot be verified. For many new companies there is no information at all available until they are in business for several years. Shell corporations established for legal or tax reasons complicate things further, since their employees are often family members who are not really in the workforce, or people who earn income elsewhere and simply channel it through the company.

A job in a small company on average adds less to the Gross National Product than a job in a large firm. In part, that is true because jobs in small businesses typically offer lower salaries than jobs with large companies, and are less likely to include pension plans and health insurance. Also, small firms are less capital intensive than large ones, so they usually produce less per worker.

The two-employee corner laundromat or the self-employed bookkeeper is a far more typical small enterprise than the fast-growing high-tech firm many politicians conjure up. David L. Birch, director of the Program on Neighborhood and Regional Change at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, attracted wide attention to the employment gains in small firms in 1979, but he observes that job creation by small business is often misunderstood. "Most small businesses create no new jobs" after they have been in business for a year or two, Birch says. "Most get to three or four or five employees and stay at that level for the rest of their lives. Eighty percent of the growth is created by 12% of the firms." Predicting which small firms will grow and which will not is impossible, Birch adds.

The link between high tech and small business is real, but it is frequently exaggerated. Most high-tech firms start out small, but relatively few small business start-ups are in such cutting edge sectors as software and systems analysis. Leading the job creation parade from 1982 to 1984 were small firms in such prosaic industries as child care, construction and trucking. While 120,000 jobs were created in computer and data processing services, nearly four times that many were added in bars and restaurants.

Nor are those companies with fast employment growth necessarily the leaders in innovation. "Most of the innovation in manufacturing creates new wealth, not new jobs," insists David Birch. And the innovators are not necessarily small. Manufacturers facing competitive pressures are among the leaders in finding ways to increase efficiency. Among younger firms, the most innovative quickly outgrow the ranks of small business. A firm that stays small is probably supplying few jobs or few innovations.

Moreover, many small business jobs do not represent net employment growth. Instead, they are jobs that large corporations chose not to add, notes Joseph W. Duncan, chief economist for The Dun & Bradstreet Corporation. "In this expansion, unlike previous ones, big companies are not adding workers, they're not adding services," Duncan says. "They're outsourcing, buying outside supplies. The result of that is demand for small businesses."

Without a doubt, the increasing numbers of small firms make the economy more efficient. But the small firm's ability to adapt to changes more quickly than larger economic units may have some negative side-effects. Rapid adjustment means more hiring, more firing, more start-ups and closings, all leading to more job changes by workers. As a result, an economy with a larger share of the workforce in small firms may well have a higher underlying rate of unemployment.

New businesses, not small businesses per se, are generally the keys to healthy economic growth. Young companies are the ones most likely to provide the economy with fast job growth and innovation. But these very firms are the ones most neglected by government policy, despite the prevalent mythology that Washington is somehow helping new companies through a wide variety of programs.

If federal programs are any indication, much help to small business is often misplaced. The Reagan Administration unsuccessfully tried to eliminate the SBA's subsidized loan program, which authorized $3 billion for 21,272 small businesses last year. The recipients represent less than 0.5% of all small firms, and many are not really small: under SBA regulations, an appliance manufacturer with 1,000 workers, a watchmaker who employs 500, and a used-car dealer with $11.5 million in sales all qualify. Programs to buy goods and services from such "small" businesses accounted for 29% of federal purchases in fiscal 1983. The largest beneficiaries: building maintenance firms, which provide neither additional jobs nor technical innovations.

Similarly, the tax system, which is supposedly designed to help small firms by giving them lower rates, does not do the job that Congress presumably intended. Most of the tax benefit goes to older small firms rather than fast-growing young companies, because the new companies have a paucity of profits to tax. Observes economist Lawrence J. White of New York University's Graduate School of Business Administration: "If small is synonymous with start-up, then all of the stuff we have put into the tax code over the last twenty years is anti-small business. Most small businesses don't benefit from the investment tax credit or from accelerated depreciation, because you only benefit if you have profits. The only thing start-up businesses don't have is profits."

Even for profitable small companies, the benefit of a lower tax rate may be less than the competitive disadvantage from tax breaks favoring capital investment, which tend to favor big firms.

On the state level as well, politicians are climbing on the bandwagon to encourage small business. With much fanfare, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, among others, have started small business loan programs, and most cities put together packages of state and federal grants to help local companies. Nearly half the cities responding to one recent survey offer tax reductions or deferrals to small firms.

But these programs often fall short of their ambitious goals. "You go back to these areas two or three years later and say, 'How many businesses have you helped?' and they say fifteen or thirty or forty," comments Frank Swain, chief counsel for advocacy of the SBA. "No doubt it's helped those fifteen or thirty or forty, but it's mostly a symbolic thing." Cutting red tape and licensing requirements might be far more helpful, he adds.

No one speaks in the state capitols or halls of Congress for the interests of companies not yet formed, or for entrepreneurs so busy being creative they have no time to lobby. Yet it is they, not small companies in general, that offer the keys to the nation's economic future. Rather than handing out money and contracts to the companies that are here now, governments looking for growth and innovation would be well advised to reduce the barriers facing the businesses of tomorrow.

CONGRATULATIONS TO MORTON BAHR, CWA'S NEW PRESIDENT

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, on July 16, Mr. Morton Bahr was elected president of the Communications Workers of America, the world's largest telecommunications union. I take special pride in this accomplishment because "Morty" Bahr has been a resident of Port Washington and, therefore, one of my constituents.

Most significant, Morty Bahr made it to the top of CWA the old-fashioned way. He earned it! For more than 30 years he has been a dedicated trade unionist, serving as a rank-and-file activist, local president, union organizer, staff representative, assistant to the vice president and, for the past 16 years, a regional vice president and executive board member, before his elevation to the top post.

Mr. Speaker, those of us in New York have long been impressed with the intensity and sophisticated level of political involvement that have characterized Morty's stewardship as head of CWA's District 1. He played an important role in both the elections of New York Governors Hugh Carey and Mario Cuomo, helping to assure their victories in the primary and general elections.

I also want to take this occasion to congratulate Mrs. Florence Bahr and the family's two children and four grandchildren.

I recently became aware of an excellent newspaper article on Morton Bahr by Kenneth C. Crowe that appeared in Newsday.

It gives me great pleasure to share this article with my colleagues.

The article follows:

FROM SEAT OF PANTS TO PRESIDENT'S SEAT

(By Kenneth C. Crowe)

Two weeks ago, in one of rituals of the American dream come of age, Morton Bahr, who will be 59 on Thursday, sent his bank the final payment of the 25-year mortgage on his house in Port Washington.

Tomorrow in San Francisco, Bahr reaches another personal milestone: He is to be elected president of the 650,000-member Communication Workers of America at the union's 47th annual convention.

It is a union that reaches into every city, every hamlet, every cranny of the continental United States. Wherever there is telephone service, there are CWA members.

And Bahr brings to its top office a fervor for action and achievement that promises to transform him into one of the foremost labor leaders in the nation. In assuming the leadership of the CWA, Bahr faces the challenge of negotiating separate labor contracts in 1986 with the eight independent companies formed out of the disintegration of the Bell System.

For the past 10 years, American Telephone & Telegraph Co. bargained a national contract with the CWA, setting the wages and fringe benefits for more than 500,000 union members. The basis for a single national contract disappeared with the breakup of the Bell System, because some of these companies are competing among themselves now, and all are facing competition from nonunion firms.

The CWA also faces the formidable task of organizing those and other union-free companies in the communications field—among them, the giant International Business Machines Inc. IBM is emerging at AT&T's principal rival in the information industry in the United States.

Organizing has been at the core of Bahr's career.

Born in Brooklyn, Bahr grew up working at newsstands managed by his father in New York City and Jersey City. His entrance into the union movement come in 1944 during World War II as an 18-year-old radio operator in the Merchant Marine, a job that required joining the American Communications Association.

In 1947, Bahr went to work for Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co. in Manhattan, covered by the same union. In January, 1948, we went out on strike," Bahr said. "The strike lasted 90 days and the company broke the union."

The company filed a petition for a decertification election during the strike, he said. Since the union's leadership had not signed non-Communist affidavits, federal law blocked it from challenging the decertification—and Bahr and his co-workers found themselves without a union.

"They were difficult times for us," Bahr recalled. Supervisors imposed an immediate speed-up to increase productivity, and raises became meager, while at unionized companies wages were escalating. "That was a turning point in my life," he said, explaining how he was transformed into a union activist.

In 1951, Bahr became a member of a CWA organizing committee at Mackay Radio, but it took until 1954 for the company to be unionized again. Bahr's career as a union official began unexpectedly with that victory. "The national union called a mass membership meeting in Manhattan Center to elect officers," he said. "I wasn't a candidate, but someone nominated me and I was elected by acclamation."

Suddenly the president of the new 1,300-member CWA Local 1172, Bahr recalls saying, "What the hell do I do now?"

"I began to learn by the seat of my pants," he said. The process must have worked. In 1957, Bahr was assigned by the union to run a campaign to organize the 24,000 workers at the New York Telephone Co. into the CWA. Success came in 1961, marking the largest victory for any union in organizing private-sector employees since the 1930s.

Bahr was elected in 1969 to his current post as vice president of CWA District One, which covers 120,000 union members in New York, New Jersey and New England. During his tenure, District One doubled its membership, with organizing efforts that included enlisting into the union 900 nurses in Buffalo and 32,000 workers in New Jersey, who became the CWA's first public employees.

Extending his organizing zeal to the national level, Bahr has designed a strategy to unionize MCI Communications Corp., the country's second-largest long-distance telephone company, as well as the 29 communications equipment manufacturing plants owned by Northern Telecom, a Canadian company. Among the tactics, he said, will be a drive to "organize and energize" CWA members themselves, making them more aware of the union's contributions to the quality of their lives, and to urge them to pass that message along to friends, neighbors and relatives working at MCI.

"Seventy-five percent of our members are from the old Bell System," Bahr said. "They enjoyed relatively good years. Perhaps we got a little lazy. It was perhaps not necessary to have membership participation. Those days are gone. No longer is it acceptable to say that bowling takes precedence over the union meeting."

Bahr, who will be paid $90,000 a year, said he would be searching for methods to make union meetings more interesting. "My intention is to raise the credibility of the union," he said. "It is my objective to make the union an alternative source of information, believable information. We are going to try to reach members in the shops, the offices and the living rooms. We're going to explore the use of closed-circuit TV for membership meetings of the air, regionally and locally."

Interviews with a cross-section of public officials, union leaders and staff members—inside and outside the CWA—and industry executives showed that Bahr is generally admired by those he deals with.

"Morty works quietly. He doesn't make a lot of noise. You wake up one morning and see a tree growing outside your window. Morty planted the seed, nurtured it, and there it is," said Norman Adler, political action director of New York City's largest public employee union, District Council 37 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

Bahr played pivotal roles in winning organized labor's pre-primary endorsement of Gov. Hugh L. Carey in the 1978 election campaign and in the effort that won the Democratic gubernatorial primary for Mario Cuomo in 1982.

Adler said; "Morty going to the presidency of the CWA could open new spheres for the labor movement. To put a guy with his kind of political sophistication in charge of a union with substantial membership in the South has the potential for bringing [them] the kind of politics that the South hasn't seen for a long time—aggressive, innovative tactics."

Bahr said he has been traveling the country during the past six months, delivering his message on the importance of an active role for the CWA in politics. He tells his listeners. "Collective bargaining does not take place in a vacuum. It is impacted by what happens politically. The only way things are changed in this country is through political action.

"In 1981, the PATCO strike took place. For the first time in the history of this republic, a president of the United States broke a union and largely the American movement stood relatively idle while this happened. What this did was to send a telegram to every corporate board room that this is the time to take on the unions, the president of the United States is showing the way. Shortly thereafter, the trend to concessionary bargaining began."

A telecommunications industry executive said that while Bahr, who led the seven-month strike against New York Telephone in 1971, is prepared for confrontations, he prefers to talk out and work out difficulties with management before they become insurmountable. "Not only is he progressive and possessed with the foresight as to where this business is going, but he was one of the first ones to say this is no longer the telephone business, this is the information industry and the CWA is only 40 percent of the action. He sees the structural changes."

Reflecting a view expressed by other union leaders, James Harold, treasurer of Nassau CWA Local 1104, said: "Morty Bahr is one of the premier labor leaders of this country. He is way ahead of his time in his thinking. He is kind of a shining star, and talent will always show."

Last September, Glenn Watts, 65, the CWA president since 1974, announced that he planned to retire a full year before his term expired, to give his successor time to prepare for the 1986 negotiations. The union's 22-member executive board selected Bahr as the consensus candidate for president. No opposition has emerged, assuring his election tomorrow.

Even before his formal election, Bahr has been elevated from New York politics to national politics. For example, he was invited to spend a Saturday in August with Sen. Edward Kennedy at the family compound in Hyannisport. Bahr has been a fervent Kennedy supporter for years, and Paul Kirk, a former Kennedy aide and now the Democratic national chairman, told him facetiously, 'I'd like to be in the room when you get the calls from Kennedy and Cuomo in 1987."

NAPLES 100TH BIRTHDAY

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year, a group of citizens from the southwest Florida city of Naples, which I am privileged to report, banded together to organize the centennial celebration of their city on the pristine shores of the Gulf of Mexico.

Throughout the year, the centennial foundation has staged events to celebrate Naples' 100th birthday. I would like to do my part here in Washington by congratulating the centennial foundation and other local organizations for honoring their historic city so magnificently. I would also like to relate a brief history of Naples.

In 1876 John and Madison Weeks became the first permanent residents of Naples. For the next 10 years, there was little activity in the Naples area. In 1885 Gen. John S. Williams and Walter N. Haldeman, two Kentucky businessmen, set out on a search for a winter retreat along Florida's west coast. Later that same year they found their retreat and named their discovery "Naples," in memory of Williams' trip to Italy 30 years earlier.

During the next few years, a small settlement began to emerge. In fact, on this day 97 years ago, a local paper reported that 80 people were living in Naples. In the opening years of the 20th century, the population of Naples numbered barely 200. If Naples was to survive and prosper, something had to be done. The answer came in the roaring twenties when two men, Barron G. Collier and Edward Crayton, decided to put an end to Naples' isolation. By the end of the decade, these men had organized the construction of two railroads and a paved highway to the soutwest Florida coast. While this increased the flow of settlers, it wasn't until after World War II that the migration to Naples accelerated, increasing its size to over 5,500 people. Thanks to the strong and brave leaders and citizens of these early growing years, Naples is celebrating its centennial. And I am proud to represent the citizens of Naples today and note how much they love their fine city.

Many local organizations are contributing something to the celebration. The city's Quilter's Guild is making a huge historical quilt to be put on display in the Collier County Museum in September. Local Girl Scout troops did a project on Calusa Indian art and the Collier County Historical Society commissioned a new flag for the city council in July. The Gulf Shore Coin Brokers minted a Naples centennial coin and the Collier County Museum designed an electric historical map of Naples. These and other local organizations and individuals deserve special thanks for taking time to honor the founders of their city.

In addition to private contributions to the celebration, the city centennial foundation has scheduled four huge public events throughout the year, since no one is sure of the exact date Naples was founded. A Centennial Costume Ball was held during the weekend of February 16–18. During Memorial Day weekend, a 100th birthday party was held in downtown Naples. The Labor Day weekend included events celebrating Naples' links to the Gulf of Mexico. And on December 14, Naples will end this centennial year with the Grand Centennial Ball. The theme of the ball has been designated, "Beautiful Naples On-The-Gulf." The proceeds of these events will go toward building a new wing to the Collier County Museum.

Once again, I would like to thank everyone who is participating in the celebration of the 100th birthday. It is a high honor and a personal privilege to represent the fine people of Naples.

NEVADA WILDERNESS PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

HON. HARRY REID

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, Nevada is virtually the only State in the Nation that has not adopted wilderness legislation. The time for such inaction, however, has run out. It is important for us to design and pass legislation to preserve and protect the diverse needs and interests of Nevada and its people.

That's why today I introduced the Nevada Wilderness Protection Act of 1985, a well-balanced compromise that will meet the needs of Nevada and the Nation for generations to come.

In order to explain in detail the issue and my proposed resolution, I am attaching the text of my press release on this wilderness legislation:

REID INTRODUCES NEVADA WILDERNESS PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

WASHINGTON.—Rep. Harry Reid today introduced the Nevada Wilderness Protection Act of 1985—the product of diverse input and thousands of hours of study—to designate approximately 723,000 acres as wilderness.

During a speech to introduce the bill before the House of Representatives, Reid said, "This bill is a carefully balanced compromise in the best interests of the state and the nation; it is not a bill for special interests." Reid, who based his statement on visits to each area included in the bill, said his legislation preserves the crown jewels of Nevada's heritage while, at the same time, releases areas that might be important for mining, oil and gas exploration, powerline corridors, skiing and other development.

Reid participated in a four-day congressional tour of Nevada, organized by Rep. John Seiberling of Ohio, chairman, House Interior and Insular Affairs Public Lands Subcommittee, which started on June 28. Subcommittee members from Pennsylvania, Georgia and Oregon, as well as Nevada Sen. Chic Hecht and Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, joined Seiberling and Reid on the 1,800-mile trip around Nevada.

In introducing his bill, Reid indicated that Nevada has more than 100 national forest roadless areas, totalling 3.6 million acres and spanning 70 percent of the National Forests in the state. Pursuant to a 1980 court decision, such "de facto" roadless areas will remain under a cloud of uncertainty until Congress acts to "release" them or the Forest Service produces court-proof environmental studies.

Until a wilderness bill is passed, Reid said, 3.6 million acres of roadless land "will remain in limbo and development plans could be thwarted by lawsuits and appeals." Many areas and development proposals are currently being appealed or are in court. "My bill will settle the issue," Reid added, "by releasing more than 2.8 million acres of 'de facto' wilderness. That means that four out of every five acres now being treated as wilderness will become available for multi-purpose use." Therefore, according to Reid, "pristine areas will be protected and lands will be available for very positive benefits for mining, oil and gas, electric power and other industries."

While other legislation claims to be "conservative," Reid's bill is a truly conservative measure. "My bill will protect and conserve some of Nevada's remaining wild areas so that Nevadans can enjoy them like they always have," Reid stressed, "rather than allowing everything to be changed by future development, exploitation or possible neglect."

It was with "conservation" in mind that Reid has met with representatives of diverse interests, ranging from the Nevada Mining Association to environmentalists to ranchers, hunters and skiers to seniors to elementary school students and others, to draft a compromise between conflicting and widely divergent wilderness proposals.

Those proposals ranged from the Friends of Nevada Wilderness coalition, 1.4 million acres; the Sierra Club, 1.3 million acres; the Forest Service RARE II wilderness, 810,000 acres, and their current draft proposal, 452,000 acres; the Nevada Mining Association's wilderness/wilderness study submission, approximately 300,000 acres; and other wilderness legislation introduced for Nevada, 137,000 acres.

After careful deliberation, Reid selected 10 areas for his 723,000-acre bill. Those areas are: Arc Dome, 146,000 acres; Boundary Peak, 8,900 acres; East Humboldts, 27,000 acres; Jarbidge Additions, 54,000 acres; Mt. Moriah, 88,000 acres; Mt. Rose, 33,000 acres; Ruby Mountains, 74,000 acres; South Snake (Wheeler Peak), 120,000 acres; Mt. Charleston, 47,000 acres; and Table Mountain, 125,000 acres.

In selecting these areas, Reid said, "It was very important to keep the interests of all Nevadans in mind." For example, Reid stressed, "I was very concerned about seniors." He said that many seniors have told him they're worried that wilderness areas will become prohibitive or inaccessible. "That's a myth," Reid said, "because the areas we're talking about are remote and rugged and do not have roads now. We're not talking about taking away roads from anyone because these areas don't have roads." Reid excluded areas with roads from his proposal. "In fact," Reid said, "my bill will help protect the very beauty of our state that so many seniors have enjoyed throughout their lives."

Finally, Reid emphasized the need to "refute some of the myths that are being circulated by certain wilderness opponents." Specifically, Reid noted:

Grazing will not be discontinued in wilderness. Reid's bill guarantees that livestock grazing can continue in accordance with guidelines worked out in 1980 with the National Cattlemen's Association.

Wilderness designation will not create clean air "buffer zones" around wilderness. The Reid bill prohibits buffer zones and, in any event, new wilderness areas by law are treated the same as nonwilderness national forest lands.

Wilderness will not impair water rights. Indeed, by protecting the headwaters of many streams, wilderness will guarantee that existing water flows and water quality are preserved for municipal and agricultural uses.

Wilderness will not impair national forest revenue-sharing with local governments because the current 75-cent-per-acre payment under the Payment in Lieu of Taxes Act will remain the same after wilderness designation.

Wilderness areas will permit hunting, fishing and trapping just as they are now. In fact, these opportunities may be increased because wilderness protects wildlife and fish habitat from the adverse effects of roadbuilding and other development.

Wilderness will not reduce the private land base in Nevada. The lands in question are National Forest lands and any private inholdings will remain private unless the landowner elects to swap or sell his inholding.

Reid asked the Public Lands Subcommittee to study carefully Table Mountain, Arc, Dome and Mt. Moriah for boundary adjustments relating to mineral exploration. Also, he wants the subcommittee to look closely at Mt. Rose because of various development projects being considered for that area.

THE FUTURE OF AFGHANISTAN

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am inserting an article from the August 1985 edition of the Reader's Digest about Afghanistan. The article, "Trained as a Terrorist—At Age Nine," presents a very vivid account and confirmation of reports that Afghan children are being spirited to the Soviet Union to undergo training as terrorists. It is very disturbing to read about how these children are indoctrinated to defy their country and even their parents and families.

The article raises the interesting question of what will happen to these children trained as terrorists. Although the Soviets may not be having much luck in suppressing the Afghan rebels, are they now trying to win by poisoning the hearts and minds of a future generation? If so, that bodes ill for the future of a free Afghanistan.

TRAINED AS A TERRORIST—AT AGE NINE

(By John Barron)

While gathering information about the ongoing war in Afghanistan, Reader's Digest Senior Editor John Barron learned of the legions of children who are being transported to the U.S.S.R. and trained as spies and assassins. Through his contacts with the freedom-fighting mojahedin, Barron was able to interview one such boy, who had been captured upon his return to Kandahar. What follows is the chilling account of that youth's corruption.

Naim was a beguiling child whose animated dark eyes and impish smile invited affection. At age nine, he was also a terrorist, intensively trained in the Soviet Union to spy, Sabotage and assassinate.

The transformation of a little boy into a Soviet robot programmed to kill began in late 1981, Naim's father, a communist political instructor and part-time military officer, told him that to be "a good Moslem" he must study under the Russians.

Frightened and fighting tears, Naim joined about 1000 other children rounded up for flights in military transports from Kabul airport to Tashkent in the Soviet Republic of Uzbekistan. The children ranged from bottle-fed infants to boys and girls as old as 15.

Many were orphans whose families had perished in the ongoing Soviet bombardment of Afghan villages. Others had been taken by force from their parents. Some had simply been abducted off the street. A few, like Naim, went with the assent of parents who expected to profit from collaboration with the Soviets.

In Tashkent the 50 or so babies disappeared; they were to be raised in Russia for eventual return to their homeland as Soviet agents or colonial administrators. The rest of the children were lodged in a large camp outside the ancient city. A tall metal fence encircling the complex was guarded by armed sentries.

Soviet instructors in military uniform spoke the children's native languages, Pashto and Farsi. From the beginning, they tried to mold the thought and behavior of the children with four simple themes:

Russia and Afghanistan are now one country and one people.

You are Moslem, and we are Moslem. We will teach you to be better Moslems.

The mojahedin [1] are not true Moslems. They are rebels and traitors who want to destroy your country. We want to defend your country.

If you study, obey us, and help us defend your country, you will have much money and power when you grow up.

Naim had heard the same from his Communist Youth Organization, a front for Khad, the Afghan secret police who are puppets of the KGB. So he had no reason to doubt the instructors.

INDOCTRINATION

Naim's first days in the Soviet Union were unhappy. Soviet discipline was harsh and the children were forbidden to talk to anyone but their own classmates. The least infraction brought a stinging slap on the face. And the meals of canned food, often not even warmed up, repelled him. At night he buried his face under his blanket and cried.

While pretending to teach the children to be "good Moslems," the Soviets actually endeavored to strip them of their fundamental Islamic values. Naim was soon to discover, for example, that alcohol—absolutely forbidden to Moslems—was freely available, that the trainees were encouraged to drink vodka and that the Russians applauded them for doing so. It was as if developing a taste for alcohol was a decisive step toward a better, more modern culture than their own.

Naim admits that he, too, drank alcohol, eager to please the Russian tutors, who had made him feel like a man. Eagerness, combined with a natural intelligence, made him one of the most apt pupils, even though he was one of the smallest and the training was demanding. Each day began with rigorous calisthenics followed by grueling runs. The children practiced hand-to-hand combat, including variations of jujitsu and karate. They learned to approach targets stealthily by slithering along the ground. They were taught how to dodge hostile patrols, take shelter in caves and mountain crevices, and survive in open terrain.

Instructions were thorough. The children were told, for example, that if a plane appeared and there was no place to hide, they should stand rigid, pretending to be a little tree. They should also close their eyes and clench their fists so their eyes and fingernails would not reflect sunlight.

ADVANCED TRAINING

Of all the drills, Naim liked firearms training the best. The crawling, fighting, hiding and the rest could have been boyish make-believe. Blindfolded, Naim could disassemble and reassemble an AK-47 assault rifle and TT 7.62-millimeter pistol as he was required to do. He had difficulty handling the rifle, which was almost as long as he was tall. But he shot the pistol well enough at short range.

[1] Literally, the word mojahedin means holy warriors. But more often it is translated as freedom-fighters. The mojahedin are, in fact, devout Moslems. Nearly six years after the Soviet invasion, they still control three-quarters of the Afghan territory and have the allegiance of an even larger proportion of the population.

The basic training at Tashkent lasted three months, ending in early spring 1982. During this time, the Soviets made no attempt to imbue the children with loyalty to the Soviet Union per se. But they influenced them by teaching obedience, fanaticism and a militant nationalism that defined Soviet and Afghan interests as one and the same. And everything was done in the name of Islam.

When the Soviets selected about 650 trainees for more advanced study, Naim was proud to be among them. The chosen flew to Samarkand, another old Uzbek city, about 160 miles away. The school there was in an isolated compound of large white buildings. The instructors treated the children politely and patiently.

The curriculum consisted of five general subjects: disguise and deception, escape methods, clandestine communications, sabotage and assassination. Naim became an excellent actor who could deftly assume the role of a mute or that of a child with deformed limbs. He could convince adults that he was an orphan who wanted to work as a servant or enlist in anti-communist causes to avenge the murder of his parents. By such guise he could ingratiate himself with victims to be assassinated or infiltrate hostile areas to spy or commit sabotage.

Naim was taught signals by which to recognize other child-agents. Capture, he learned, never meant surrender. Always there would be a chance to escape by starting a fire, deflecting the attention of a guard, breaking away while being transferred, or playing sick. All else failing, he could confess, plead for mercy as a child and feign reformation.

TOY BOMBS

The Soviets also made Naim adept at handling and planting explosives, including powerful military mines that he could explode from afar by wire.

After Naim completed his training, he could competently kill by other means as well. He knew enough anatomy to plunge a knife where it would kill most quickly. He learned how to slip up behind a victim with his pistol and fire into the base of the skull or beneath the ear. He learned how to sneak up to buildings and toss grenades through windows.

But to Naim, "toy bombs" constituted the cleverest method of killing. He studied diagrams of a doll, a tambourine, a ballpoint pen and a watch, each loaded with explosives. The Soviets instructed him to make his way into mojahedin areas and sell such "toys" cheaply to other children. If necessary, he would explain that his father was a toy dealer. Later the disguised explosives would detonate, killing or mutilating anybody nearby. Such devices, the instructors said, would be made available back in Afghanistan by the Youth Organization.

The Soviets told Naim that he might be sent abroad to distribute comparably lethal gadgets. For foreign missions, they said, he would be rewarded with high pay and promotions.

The course at Samarkand also lasted three months. As the Russians intended, the training had stripped Naim of all boyish innocence and severed him from the spiritual moorings of his heritage, culture and family. It left him with only one conscious goal—to use everything the Soviets taught him in whatever they told him to do.

LESSONS APPLIED

In the summer of 1982, Naim returned to Afghanistan and was sent to the city of Kandahar. He promptly began working for the Youth Organization.

Reconnoitering the streets one day, he sighted some mojahedin and raced back to headquarters. Immediately, the Afghan military authorities dispatched tanks to attack. Even though the mojahedin destroyed two of the tanks and escaped, the Youth Organization commended Naim and presented him with a new pair of trousers.

On another occasion, he and two other children followed a youth suspected of being a mojahedin informant. In a market, they spotted the informant talking to a "rebel" and opened fire at them with pistols. They missed, but the Communist Party still was pleased.

About three months after his return, Naim went forth hoping to duplicate his earlier successes. Following directions from children on the street, he approached a group of mojahedin. They treated him as a pest and ordered him to go away. Then he heard a youth, who apparently recognized him as a Youth Organization member, shout that he was a spy.

Naim ran, with mojahedin in pursuit. As he tried to cock his pistol, it caught painfully in the flesh of his small hand. A bullet whistled over his head and he instinctively dropped to the ground. Next he felt himself scooped up and thrown over the shoulder of a fierce-looking guerrilla.

After intensive interrogation and verification of those aspects of Naim's story they could check, the mojahedin decided to take him into the mountains and try to rehabilitate him. Twice Naim fled, but the mojahedin soon recaptured him. Once he escaped, hid all night in a tree and remained at large more than three weeks before voluntarily returning to the mojahedin.

Naim is now almost 13. At a hidden mojahedin redoubt I talked to him for two days last March. In May, I interviewed him again for three days.

The story that emerged from intense questioning was consistent with the one Naim had told mojahedin interrogators three years ago. His answers were often accompanied by vivid gestures—sometimes he acted out bodily attacks on the enemy, or showed me how he had avoided a danger. Such graphic details coming from a child were frightening.

I also interrogated Hamim Gul, a recent defector from the Afghan secret police. He told about the training that Afghan children are undergoing in the Soviet Union, describing it much as Naim had.

What will happen to Naim and the hundreds of other children trained as terrorists with him? We do not know. Nor do we know how many more children have been spiritually deformed with the expectation that they will deform lives of people everywhere.

Naim is but a symbol of them all.

GETTING THE BUDGET MESSAGE

HON. FRED J. ECKERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. ECKERT of New York. Mr. Speaker, my constituent questionnaire this year asked the question: To reduce the budget deficit, which approach should Congress stress—raising taxes or cutting spending? Eighty-eight percent of those replying favored cutting spending.

Nationwide polls containing similar questions have brought similar results: Don't increase taxes, but cut spending to reduce the Government's red ink.

Mr. Speaker, the people know what needs to be done to slash our overwhelming budget deficit and head off the serious economic consequences it portends. It is time Congress got the message and gave up playing games with the budget and deficit.

A leading newspaper in western New York, the Batavia Daily News, recently carried an editorial message for Congress, entitled, "Dealing with Reality." I place it in the RECORD and urge that we in Congress prepare to follow its advice:

DEALING WITH REALITY

Are America and its leaders in Washington chasing their tails?

Bill Dunkelberg, Purdue University economist and frequent adviser to businesses and legislative groups, is afraid so and wonders if we really want to deal with the realities.

He observes that just four items—interest on the debt, defense, health and Social Security—make up more than 80 percent of government spending. But to many people they are also the untouchables.

"If we won't control these, we cannot control government spending," he says.

Consider the interest-on-debt factor.

Soon federal debt will amount to $2 trillion, up from less than $1 trillion in 1979. At an average interest of 10 percent, he observes, this debt will cost about $200 billion a year in interest payments, up from $120 billion this year.

Unable to cut spending more than $50 billion or so, he wonders where Congress "will find an extra $50 billion to $80 billion to pay interest to the holders of government bonds."

Well, some people say, we could tax the rich and cut defense. "Neither will work," says Dunkelberg.

"If we taxed every dollar made by those earning $100,000 or more a year we'd collect only $60 billion to $70 billion in revenue, hardly enough to balance the budget much less finance government largesse."

And that amount, he adds, assumes that the rich would still be willing to work. "People who earn big salaries often create jobs for the rest of us," he comments. "Why give them disincentives to work?"

Cut defense spending? "Unfortunately, we haven't learned to live together in peace, and some outlays are necessary." How much? "Alas, the politicians must decide this."

Today, defense spending amounts to about 6.5 percent of gross national product, our total income, up from 4.5 percent in President Carter's last year, but a lot less than we have given to defense over the past 30 years.

Health care now amounts to 11 percent of GNP, and that, Dunkelberg stresses, "is far more than we save or invest in new plant and equipment in a year."

The government pays more than 40 percent of the total, financed through tax revenues and borrowing. "Unless there is some real reform, this will only get worse," he says.

Social Security makes up the final of the four items that together make up four-fifths of government spending.

There is good reason for the difficulty in cutting Social Security, he observes. "It isn't a retirement program—it's a transfer program, taking money from workers and transferring it to retirees," he says.

As most people know, there is an increasing number of Americans in or heading toward those retirement years, and for them the numbers look good.

"If you retire today," Dunkelberg points out, "in about three years you will have received all of your—and your employer's—contributions during your work period, with about 5 percent interest."

After that, he says, "you're on the system," meaning you collect money you never saved and invested. He calculates that "by the year 2000 there will be only a few workers for every retiree." Contrast that with about 15 workers per beneficiary when the system was begun.

Well, you say, perhaps we really can GROW out of the deficit—produce so much and earn so much tax revenue that we'll simply overcome the problem.

Hardly. "It would require five years of growth at rates never achieved in our entire history for such a long period of time."

Unfortunately, he says, some politicians have in effect chosen to ignore the deficit problem by accepting such unrealistic assumptions.

"Congress still hasn't received the message," says Dunkelberg. That message, he says, is that consumers do not want to pay for everything government is doing.

"They want spending cuts. They do not want more borrowing, and they certainly do not want more inflation."

It unfortunately appears that there are too many untouchables in the political and bureaucratic sphere that keep rocking the ship of state.

REMEMBERING INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, Harry John November, a medical doctor and World War II veteran, and a Californian, wrote to me recently about current events and enclosed a poem he had written on July 4, 1985. The poem captures a love of this country and a recognition of those who have sacrificed so much for it in times of war. I was moved by this poem, and wish I had had it available to me before we went out of session for the Fourth of July.

The poem is entitled simply "Fourth of July, 1985." I am pleased to be able to share it with my colleagues and the American people:

FOURTH OF JULY, 1985

Who says that we should cringe
Before the fetid breath of evil men
Whose chosen prey are those unarmed?
Are we a nation so unhinged by every boastful threat
Of strutting, ranting knaves, we fold before their wind?
Who chants that vapid rune
And whispers in the dark, seducing weakened souls?
Only those obsequious buffoons who, ignorant of history,
Would dare declaim: Melt the iron from your spine
And let it sag, negotiate, adjudicate, equivocate,
Haul down the flag, don't fight!
Just tie a yellow ribbon, the sun will bleach it white.
Are they Americans or gaggles of cackling geese?
Do they equate the dust of those who fell
At Lexington and New Orleans, chickamouga, Gettysburg, in Belleau Wood and Chateau Thierry, Guadalcanal and Normandy, soldiers, battle wrenched and weary
In the mountains of Korea and the jungles of Viet Nam: Do they equate Their dust
With grime and soot gathered on an empty shelf in some forgotten room,
Is that their querulous tune?
Not for me, that whining rune,
Nor yet the plaintive bleat of those who chant,
We must try to understand.
I understand full well!
Those pirates thirst to do me in,
That's all I need to know,
And I'll have none of it;
They would have me forget that freedom brings the highest price—beyond the reach of shrunken souls who quail before a pirate's threat,
Fearfully unwilling to pay the price of Liberty,
That quintessential rarity
Our forebears bought with blood.

ALFONSIN BETWEEN ROCK AND HARD PLACES

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, Argentina is experiencing an extreme economic crisis that may threaten the newly reemerged democracy. For President Raul Alfonsin, domestic and international monetary difficulties have put a drain on popular confidence in his government. Aside from economic problems, the trials of the military junta leadership, under whose command thousands of innocent Argentines were tortured and murdered, has sparked a new round of right-wing violence. A report by James Anderson, a research associate of the Washington-based Council on Hemispheric Affairs, gives a valuable overview of the current situation in Argentina. The report is an abridgement of a longer article on the subject which recently appeared in COHA's biweekly publication, the Washington Report on the Hemisphere. I would encourage all of my colleagues to read Mr. Anderson's informative article.

TOUGH TIMES FOR ARGENTINA'S ALFONSIN

(By James Anderson)

A run on dollars by depositors involving several major Argentine private banks that dwarfed Ohio and Maryland's troubles, confusion over the government's closing of the nation's 11th-largest bank, stalled credit inflows from the International Monetary Fund [IMF] and a general strike by the country's powerful labor confederation have put President Raul Alfonsin between a rock and many hard places, with the popularity of his Radical Civic Union government plummeting as crucial congressional elections approach in November. Without an easing on at least one of these fronts, and given outbreaks of right-wing violence connected to the ongoing trials of former leaders of the military regime, Alfonsin faces a familiar volatile situation that served to bring down the previous civilian governments of Arturo Frondizi, Arturo Illia and Isabel Peron.

Even without the May 23 nationwide strike, called by the General Confederation of Workers [CGT] leadership, Alfonsin has his hands full seeking to bring the domestic economy under control and break a deadlock with Argentina's international creditor institutions. The main stumbling block is inflation, which has risen from 450 percent to 938 percent since the president took office in December 1983. Though committed under the terms of an austerity pact with the IMF to reduce inflation to 150 percent by the end of the year, few expect the government to make any significant inroads, particulary as long as it keeps indexing wages to 90 percent of the previous month's inflation rate.

Alfonsin's economic ministers have been unable or hesitant to initiate tough measures to tackle soaring prices; it was for this reason that former Economic Minister Bernardo Grinspun was sacked last March. But Grinspun's successor, Juan Sourrouille, carries little influence within Radical Party circles, and his austerity-minded messages are bound to gain few sympathetic ears amongst Radical deputies mindful of November's lower chamber elections, in which the party's slim majority is expected to face a difficult test.

The failure to break inflation and curtail public spending prompted the Fund to abrogate its September 1984 $1.4 billion pact with Argentina in March, putting some $500 million in standby credits for debt interest servicing on indefinite hold. Since then, the country has been able to pay only $50 million of an accumulated backlog of $1.43 billion in interest payments alone on the $48 billion foreign debt.

Inconclusive negotiations with IMF officials to restart the agreement—the most recent took place in Washington the week of May 20—have blocked the Fund's acceptance of a five-year economic program that would open the way for creditor banks to proceed with a comprehensive rescheduling of Argentina's servicing of its external obligations, and release some $4.2 billion in all-but-essential new monies. In a speech before Radical supporters in Buenos Aires last month, Alfonsin pledged to initiate a "war economy" to encourage bankers and gain some leverage over the inflation rate. He privately asked his ministers to draft proposals for slashing government spending by at least 12 percent, though many observers see cuts of 20 to 30 percent as a minimum step that could bring results. Layoffs of up to 30,000 state employees and a hiring freeze, as well as new income taxes, were envisioned as measures to trim the public deficit and spur the IMF talks along.

But the government's bungling in its closure of the Banco de Italia y Rio de la Plata—the eighth such institution closed by the Central Bank in recent months for holding dangerous debt portfolios—produced an unexpected run on dollar deposits at both private and public institutions across the country that left international financiers skeptical of the soundness of the country's banking system.

Under the sway of impatient international creditors, the government also is continuing to cut defense expenditures; a wholesale reorganization of the armed forces command structure is underway in order to meet government spending targets. To come under the knife is the military's ambitious post-Falklands arms buying spree, as well as operational expenses. Public outlays for the armed forces will amount to an estimated three percent of gross domestic product in 1985, whereas the government's goal is to bring that figure to two percent—which would be a 15-year low.

But a perhaps-partisan report released in January by a team of researchers at England's University of Bradford charges that the real figure for the Argentine military's expenses runs up to eight percent of gross national product, largely owing to the weapon's-acquisition campaign. Argentina's "careful and sophisticated rearmament program," the report alleges, has given that nation's military an offensive capability against British forces arrayed on the tiny Falklands that would have been "impossible two years ago."

While such purchases and modernization may well run counter to austerity-minded economists in Buenos Aires and Washington, Alfonsin's government has given little indication that it is bent on curbing weapons purchases spurred by the perceived continuing British threat. In a lengthy speech before the Organization of American States May 16, Foreign Minister Dante Caputo lodged a highly-charged protest against Great Britain's May 12 inauguration of one of two runways located at its Falklands Mount Pleasant military airport, capable of accommodating large troop transport aircraft as well as advanced fighter craft. Stating that "the United Kingdom is creating a threat," Caputo warned that Argentina "feels obliged to take indispensable measures to protect its own security."

No one is yet declaring that current trends forbode for Alfonsin the fate that befell former Presidents Frondizi (1962), Illia (1966) and Peron (1976), when the armed forces felt obliged to take into its own hands a chaotic domestic economic situation, tattered relations with international creditors and rampant labor agitation. Still, right-wing paramilitary violence directed against government figures and installations, politicians and journalists—which nearly all believe is connected to coup-minded sectors within the armed forces—is emerging with renewed vigor.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF FORT MYERS, FL

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, from August 12, 1985, to March 23, 1986, the citizens of Fort Myers, a community in my southwest Florida congressional district, are celebrating the 100th anniversary of their city's founding. I would like to take this opportunity to relate a brief history of Fort Myers and describe a few of the events scheduled for the city's centennial celebration.

In 1841 Fort Harvis was constructed along the Caloosahatchee River as a base of operations against the Seminole Indians. A decade later, Fort Harvis went under a period of reconstruction and was renamed Fort Myers, in honor of Col. Abraham C. Myers. But 8 years later, the base was no longer needed, and Fort Myers was abandoned.

It wasn't until the late 1860's that settlers came to Fort Myers. The population slowly increased and in 1876 the citizens incorporated as an official community. That same year, the plot for Fort Myers was recorded in Key West, the county seat of Monroe County, and the name of Fort Myers was changed to just Myers. It was to legally remain Myers until 1901.

"Fort" Myers continued to grow and in 1885 the population numbered 349. It was during this same year that Thomas Edison came to Fort Myers. He fell in love with the city and became its most famous resident. On August 12, 1885, the citizens held an election of public officials, and on March 23, 1886, they obtained their city charter.

With two newspapers and several prospering businesses, Fort Myers grew steadily. By the start of the 20th century, 943 souls inhabited the city. With the aid of a building boom and the new coast railroad, the community flourished. This time of immense growth, the Boom Time, lasted through the roaring twenties. But these prosperous times came to an abrupt halt in 1929. Just like the rest of the Nation, Fort Myers suffered during the Great Depression. However, the citizens didn't give up, and in just a few years, they were back on their feet again. After World War II, Fort Myers began to grow again, and today it is a vibrant and proud community whose citizens haven't forgotten the brave men and women who wouldn't let their community stagnate.

City officials, including Mayor Art Hamel, kicked off the 100 year birthday celebration with a month long beard growing contest earlier this summer. Beginning July 10, 25 hairy contestants were judged August 10.

This month, the Fort Myers' Centennial Committee begins its series of events with a historical lecture at the local museum. October will boast a huge block party in downtown Fort Myers, an antique car show, and a tennis tournament. The Pioneer Dinner, honoring the older Fort Myers families, as well as the Sailing Regatta, will be held in November. An arts and crafts show will be on display throughout November and December.

In January 1986, the Centennial Committee has scheduled a children's poster contest, a golf tournament, and a fishing tournament. In February's annual Edison Pageant of Lights, volunteers will enter a special centennial float. And on March 23, 100 years after Fort Myers received its city charter, the committee will sponsor a huge barbecue at Exhibition Hall culminating in a grand fireworks finale.

I would like to thank the citizens for all they are doing to honor our community and those who founded it. I would also like to say what an honor and personal privilege it is to represent the fine citizens of Fort Myers.

SOUTHERN GOVERNORS, MAINLAND UNIONS AND HISPANIC ATTORNEYS SUPPORT RETENTION OF SECTION 936

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, several very authoritative voices in the mainland have recently expressed their opposition to the proposal to repeal or substantially modify section 936.

There is no doubt that it is becoming increasingly clear to very important sectors of the American electorate that it would be foolhardy to change section 936. The following are some of the significant sectors which have recently expressed support for preserving section 936 as it is now:

The Newpaper Guild, at its recent 52d annual convention held in Pittsburgh, strongly urged both the President and the U.S. Congress to maintain section 936 of the IRS in its 1984 status.

The National Hispanic Bar Association, representing thousands of Hispanic lawyers across the Nation at its annual convention in New York last weekend, agreed to oppose the elimination of section 936.

In the next few days two of the largest unions in the mainland will be expressing their support for section 936.

Finally, the Southern Governors Conference, at its annual meeting in Miami, as reported in the San Juan Star of September 11, 1985, in a strongly worded resolution, supported the retention of section 936, highlighting the jobs and incomes generated in Puerto Rico and in southern States as a result of section 936.

I request that the following excerpts of that news story be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The Hernández Colón administration had support Tuesday, in Puerto Rico's battle to defend Section 936 before Congress, from the Southern Governor's Conference in Miami.

The support came in the form of a resolution which stated the repeal of the industrial tax exemption would present the U.S. government with the "perplexing problem" of increasing aid to Caribbean nations while reducing benefits to a "part of America" in the same region.

The resolution, presented by Florida Gov. Bob Graham, opposes any changes in the current language of Section 936 of the U.S. Internal Revenue Code.

Section 936 allows local subsidiaries of U.S. firms to remit profits to parent companies without paying federal taxes. A proposal to eliminate the industrial tax exemption is part of President Reagan's huge tax reform package now before Congress.

The resolution says Section 936 has been the foundation for economic development in Puerto Rico and has had its effect on the southern states because of proximity and trade between the two regions.

"There are great parallels between the economic history of Puerto Rico and that of the South as a whole—from rural, labor-intensive agricultural areas into urban and high-technology centers. Because of the proximity, the two-way trade between Puerto Rico and the Southern states has resulted in jobs and income in both locations," the resolution says.

It adds the president's tax plan seeks to change 936 in a way that would discourage new investments in Puerto Rico. It argues that the proposal comes at a time of reductions in federal aid and presents an added economic hardship to the island.

"It would present the perplexing problem of having the federal government extending benefits to Caribbean nations while reducing benefits to a part of America in the same geographic area. Finally, the proposed change would make difficult Puerto Rico's own initiative to use 936 monies as a special loan fund for CBI (Caribbean Basin Initiative) twinplant manufacturing."

THE OHIO ECONOMY

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, with international trade emerging as a priority issue in Congress, all of us benefit from thoughtful research on the subject. I would like to enter into the RECORD just such a piece recently written by one of my constituents. I hope my colleagues find it informative.

GLOBAL COMPETITION WILL SHAPE OHIO INDUSTRY

(By Borge R. Reimer, Executive Vice President, Dana Corp.)

From the 1860s to the 1960s, Ohio's manufacturers paced America's development as the world's industrial leader. Our largest cities and their major products were synonymous around the world: steel from Cleveland and Youngstown, rubber products from Akron, machine tools from Cincinnati, glass products from Toledo, consumer appliances from Dayton—and everywhere the manufacture of motor vehicles and motor vehicle parts. Ohio's industries were the workshop of America; and we had no reason to expect the future to be different.

Since the 1960's, in retrospect, "the future" has been anything but what we expected. In our national economy, imported manufactured goods now have one-third of the market in such key industries as steel, autos, and machine tools. Our overall trade deficit is an astronomical $130 billion, with little chance of improvement. And the impact of international competition on Ohio industry is clearly seen in our above-average unemployment rate, and below-average economic growth.

Certainly our economic base in Ohio goes well beyond traditional manufacturing industries. We have a solid foundation in service industries, and a growing presence in high-technology fields. But it is in manufacturing, which still employs 25% of all Ohioans, that we face the greatest change and greatest challenge. That is because the business environment itself has changed—to competition in global markets using world class technology applied through a global marketing strategy.

"Foreign competition" does not exist in today's world. The word "foreign" once implied something distant, something that need not concern us, something downright unpatriotic. But we've learned the hard way that the Japanese, for example (who export 55% of what their automotive industry produces, compared to our 3%), are not foreign competitors; they are international competitors. That reality must reshape our whole way of thinking about business.

As the result of technology, the world is shrinking (in an abstract way) at an ever faster rate. Transportation is just one example: the ocean flight that took Lindbergh 33½ hours in 1927 takes 3½ hours by Concorde today. Even more dramatic is the smaller world that electronics create. Satellites today can transmit information anywhere in the world. In the U.S. alone, tens of thousands of people work to process and link electronically-transmitted data. And through global networks of computers, we can communicate in real time using words, numbers, and graphics.

[1] Ohio's export-related manufactures were as follows in million dollars: 1976, 10,576; 1977, 11,047; 1980, 17,394; and 1981, 18,132. About 26 percent of the increase in Ohio's manufacturing production from 1977 to 1981 was generated by growth in export-related manufactures.

As this technology shrinks the world, we are confronted with a global market. As a practical matter, this global market is really easier to approach than the purely domestic market of just a few years ago. Take the motor vehicle industry as an example. As the world gets "smaller," markets get smaller and the number of competitors shrinks. The survivors are truly international companies—thus, in the truck industry, you find companies like White/Volvo and Mack/Renault.

Faced with international competition in international markets, it is necessary to compare American (and Ohio) industry to our global competitors—whether the competition is in Germany or Brazil or Korea or Japan. The competitive scenario differs in specifics from industry to industry, but it's possible to make some generalizations on where we in American manufacturing stand in four critical areas:

(1) Quality. We were surpassed in some major industrial sectors by our international competition in the mid-1970's. Our quality is still increasing, but—up to now—at a slower rate than in other countries—where such rapid improvement was needed for effective global marketing.

(2) Price. The U.S. has long been the high-price producer, but only recently have we become concerned about the international implications. Price influences sourcing decisions, exports, and the willingness of international companies to set up their own operations here. In each instance, high prices make us a potential loser.

(3) Product Technology. This is our strong point, but the gap between us and the rest of the world is closing—to our disadvantage. The world market now expects technology and quality in any product, from any country, to be high.

(4) Manufacturing Technology. This is also basically a strong point. We have manufacturing technology equal to or better than that of anyone in the world. But some of our deficiencies in applying that technology make the scenario here similar to that in quality: some international competitors passed us in the mid-1970's.

That's our general international competitive position; and it's not in our favor. What can a business in Ohio do about it? I would suggest we realize that leadership in a global market centers on leadership in quality, in technology, and in low cost—in other words, total quality in everything we do and make. In the world market, total quality is not just the recipe for success; it's the necessity for survival.

For any company, the resources to achieve total quality are our people and our technology. Let's look at each in turn.

Every company has a personality, a system of shared values—a culture. In some companies this culture as an important ingredient of being a successful competitor is only dimly perceived, or is not perceived at all. Other companies make a real effort at reinforcing a culture. The people of any company will invariably perform up to—or down to—the expectations of their culture. If we stress the pursuit of total quality as a goal in everything we do in our companies, our people will be more than able to perform as their culture demands. If we make the commitment to total quality, the results will invariably follow. This change in mind alone will take us 80% of the way toward being viable, successful global competitors.

To handle the remaining 20% requires a different commitment. It is a truism that people can't outperform their tools. Most of our "tools" in Ohio industry are productive; but some of them are tied and can't meet the needs of today's global competition. Dedication to total quality in itself will not produce the desired results without the support of the latest in world class technology where required—technology such as robotics, CAD/CAM, computers, and flexible machining centers.

At Dana Corporation we have embarked on what we call "Project 90": a major effort to make us number one in technology, quality, and low cost in our global markets by 1990. Our corporate culture, which we call "The Dana Style," gives our people maximum individual responsibility and flexibility to pursue total quality. To provide the tools for that pursuit, we have committed in "Project 90" to over $200 million in new capital spending this year. And our future capital spending levels likely will be comparable. Not every company can spend the same amount; but every company can aspire to the same kind of commitment.

The implications of global competition are far-reaching. We in Ohio industry, and in American industry, have only begun to see where these implications are taking us. But it is clear that we must act now to strengthen our competitive position. The old world in which Ohio industry was built is gone. It's up to every company to make the commitment to survive and prosper in the new one.

GENERAL VON STEUBEN—A REVOLUTIONARY WAR HERO

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, September 17 marks the 255th anniversary of the birth of Gen. Friedrich Wilhelm von Steuben, one of the leading patriots and heroes of the American Revolution. As a native German, von Steuben's commitment to the principles of freedom and self-determination were aroused by the American struggle for independence, and he came to our shores to help in our struggle for liberty. Without the help of this valiant soldier, America's fight for independence would have been much more difficult.

Recruited in Paris by American Commissioners Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane, after having achieved high standing for his military accomplishments with the Prussian Army, von Steuben arrived in Portsmouth, NH, on December 1, 1777. In January 1778, he was received with high honors by the Continental Congress at York, PA, and on February 23, he reported to Gen. George Washington at Valley Forge.

During the bitter cold days at Valley Forge, and at a time when the Colonies were suffering through military setbacks and low morale, von Steuben went to work and sustained the courage of his men, even contributing his private funds for their well-being. General Washington assigned him the task of training the Continental Forces, and the capable drill company which von Steuben formed and commanded was emulated throughout the ranks, enabling the American troops to overcome the strongest and most powerful fighting force in the world. For his efforts, on April 30, 1778, General Washington appointed him Inspector General of the Army with the rank of major general.

In the winter of 1778–79, von Steuben wrote the "Regulations for the Order and Discipline of the Troops of the United States," a monumental manual on the basics of drill and field service regulations, outlining the essentials of military procedure. This "blue book" served as the official Army manual until 1812; and through the use of this handbook and von Steuben's leadership, an Army of irregulars was transformed into a disciplined and organized combat unit.

In 1781, von Steuben continued his distinguished military career in America, by serving in the battle against Cornwallis in Virginia, and at the battle of Yorktown, where he commanded one of the three divisions of the Continental Army. In recognition and in appreciation of his services the State of New York awarded General von Steuben a $16,000 estate, and Congress granted him a pension of $2,500 for the rest of his life.

On Saturday, September 21, the United German-American Societies of Greater Chicago will be sponsoring the 20th annual General von Steuben parade. The parade will step off at noon at Wacker Drive and Dearborn Street in downtown Chicago, and will proceed down Dearborn Street to the reviewing stand located at the Daley Center. Many scores of floats will join in this commemorative tribute to a gallant patriot, along with promoting the many contributions of Americans of German ancestry to the growth and strength of America.

This year, in conjunction with the parade, the United German Societies of Chicago will also sponsor a great 3-day German Festival from Friday, September 20, through Sunday, September 22. The celebration will take place at the Ludwig Mies Van der Rohe Plaza, at Leland and Western Avenues in Chicago, and will include live German music, German food, and many other events to highlight German traditional culture.

The members and officers of the United German American Societies of Greater Chicago have long been vital and creative citizens in their individual communities, helping to make the Chicago land area a better place to live. I congratulate them on their resourceful service to the city of Chicago, and I especially extend my warmest best wishes to Karl C. Laschet, general chairman and grand parade marshal, and all the members of the 20th Annual General von Steuben Parade Committee, who have worked so diligently and energetically to insure that this year's parade and salute to German Americans will be an overwhelming success. The names of the parade leadership and committee membership follow:

Karl C. Laschet, General Chairman & Grand Parade Marshal; Erich Himmel, 1 Vize-Praesident; Michael Bruckner, 2 Vize-Praesident; Betty Center, Korrespondenz Sekretaerin; Klara Winkler, Protokoll Sekretaerin; Helmut Schmidt, Schatzmeister; Helen Meiszner, Steuben-Parade Sekretaerin; Inge Himmel, Kornblumen Vorsitzende; Joseph Zottmann, Karten Schatzmeister; John Ahsmann, Archivar; Horst Seyferth, Rechts-Anwalt.

Directoren: Karl Kurz, Josef Anetsberger, Joseph Zottmann, Olga Tietz, Alfonse Schneeman, Anna Rusdeinsky, Elisabeth Kraus, Joseph Freiburger, Melvin Brandt, John Kraus.

Finanzkomitee: Inge Himmel, Henrietta Balles, Peter Kurtz, Fritz Baumgarth, Richard Guenther.

Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the commemoration of the birth of the great Revolutionary War hero, General von Steuben, I extend my greetings and best wishes to all participants in this year's parade, along with all German-Americans who reside in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Americans of German descent throughout the Nation, who are celebrating this inspiring event.

PARADISE LOST: NADINE GORDIMER TALKS ABOUT SOUTH AFRICA

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, the September 8 edition of the New York Times Magazine had an excellent article by South African novelist Nadine Gordimer. Ms. Gordimer provides some excellent insight on the problems that apartheid has created within the white community of South Africa.

At one point she says, "It is not true that the South African Government is bent on genocide, as some black demagogues have averred (the black man is too useful for that); but it is true that the unconscious will to genocide is there in some whites." Whether apartheid can be called a prescription for genocide or not, Ms. Gordimer shows us the various ways in which it wraps the perspective of those who use it as a protective measure.

I submit Ms. Gordimer's article for the perusal of my colleagues:

[From the New York Times Magazine, Sept. 8, 1985]

GUARDING 'THE GATES OF PARADISE'

(By Nadine Gordimer)

(Nadine Gordimer, the author of many novels and short-story collections, most recently, "Something Out There," has coproduced with Hugo Cassirer the film "Allan Boesak: Choosing for Justice" to be shown this fall on PBS)

We whites in South Africa present an undated version of the tale of the emperor's clothes; we are not aware of our nakedness—ethical, moral, and fatal—clothed as we are in our own skin. This morning on the radio the news of the withdrawal of more foreign diplomats from South Africa, and the continuing threat of the withdrawal by foreign banks, was followed by a burst of pop-music defiance by the state-owned South African Broadcasting Corporation, on behalf of Afrikaners and English-speaking whites. "Allies," yelled a disco idol, "We're allies, with our backs against the w-all. . . ."

There is an old misconception still current abroad: the Afrikaners are the baddies and the English-speakers, the angels among whites in our country. The categories do not fall so neatly into place. Not all Afrikaners support the state of emergency and the sadistic police and army actions that led up to it, and not all English-speakers would implode apartheid tomorrow if it were possible to prevail against the Afrikaner army that mans the Afrikaner fortress.

The misconception surprises me. Anyone who follows the reports of foreign press correspondents in South Africa must be aware that in November 1983, the Prime Minister, Mr. P.W. Botha, received an overwhelming "yes" vote for his new Constitution, with its tricameral parliament for whites, Indians and coloreds (people of mixed race)—and the total exclusion of the black majority. The referendum held was open to whites only, both Afrikaners and English-speakers; Mr. Botha could not have received a mandate if the English-speaking whites had voted "no." "Yes," they said, voting along with supporters of Mr. Botha's National Party. "Yes," they said, 23.5 million black people shall have no say in the central government of South Africa.

And "yes," said the Reagan Government too, entering into constructive engagement with a policy destructive of justice and human dignity, while mumbling obeisance to abhorrence of apartheid like those lapsed believers who cross themselves when entering a church.

There is no special position of non-Afrikaner whites in South Africa, nor has there been for a very long time.

The actual division among whites in our country falls between the majority—Afrikaner and English-speaking—who support the new Constitution, whether directly or circuitously, as a valid move toward "accommodating black aspirations" (let us not invoke justice), and the minority—English-speaking and Afrikaner—who oppose the Constitution as irremediably unjust and unjustifiable. Fewer Afrikaners than English-speakers oppose apartheid, but the English-speakers who uphold the central government of South Africa represent a majority in their language group.

When blacks speak about the "Boer" these days, they're not just referring to Afrikaners; the term has become a generic rather than an ethnic one. It is likely to refer to a mode of behavior, an attitude of mind, a position. The nomenclature encompasses all whites who voluntarily and knowingly collaborate in oppression of blacks. Not all Afrikaners are "Boer," and many English-speakers with pedigrees dating back to the 1820 settlers are. . . . States of mind and ways of life under crisis would be expected more or less to follow the lines of division, and I believe that states of mind do. Everywhere I go, I sense a relaxation of the facial muscles among whites who had appeared to be tasting the ashes of the good life when Soweto was on fire in the week before the state of emergency was declared in July. Approval of the state's action is not often explicit in my company, because it is known that I belong to the minority within the white minority that opposes the Constitution as a new order of oppression in contempt of justice, and sees the state of emergency as an act of desperation: a demonstration of the failure of the Government's atrocious "new deal" only a few months after it was instituted. The general feeling among whites is that fear has been staved off—at least for a while.

The police dogs are guarding the gates of paradise. Keep away from roads that pass where the blacks and the police-army are contained in their vortex of violence, and life can go on as usual. One can turn one's attention to matters that affect one directly and can be dealt with without bloodying one's hands: lobbying all over the world against disinvestment and sports boycotts. These are areas where sophisticated people understand one another in economic and leisure self-interests: for many, the only brotherhood that transcends nation and race.

There is a physical and mental cordoning-off of "areas of unrest." The police and army take care of the first matter, and that extraordinary sense of whiteness, of having always been different, always favored, always shielded from the vulnerabilities of poverty and powerlessness, takes care of the second.

As for the less worldly among the white majority, they express openly their approval of Government violence in the last few months, and there is a group that believes there has not been enough of it. "The Government should shoot the lot." This remark was offered to my friend, the photographer David Goldblatt, in all crazy seriousness; there are whites in whose subconscious the power of the gun in a white man's hand is magical (like his skin?) and could wipe out an entire population more than five times as large as that of the whites.

In bizarre historical twinship, this is the obverse of the teachings of the mid-19th-century prophetess Nongqause, of the Xhosa tribe. Nongqause told her people that by following her instructions they could cause all those who wore trousers—the white men—to be swept away by a whirlwind. . . .

It is not true that the South African Government is bent on genocide, as some black demagogues have averred (the black man is too useful for that); but it is true that the unconscious will to genocide is there in some whites.

So is belief in the old biblical justification for apartheid, that blacks are the descendents of Ham, although even the Dutch Reformed Church has embarrassedly repudiated this. Over lunch on his fathers Transvaal farm recently, I met a handsome young Afrikaner on leave from military service. Grace was said. When the young man lifted his bowed head, he gave an exposition of biblical justification that was all his own, I think; blacks are the descendants of Cain and a curse on humankind. I did not rise to the bait; but my eyes must have betrayed that I could scarcely believe my ears. Later, among the women of the family, I was shown their new acquisition, a pristine white dishwasher that had replaced the black maid. The young Afrikaner took the opportunity to fire at me, "Yes, it's a good white Kaffir girl."

During the weeks that led up to the state of emergency, the Eastern Cape black townships had become ungovernable. Violence was horrific in the vicinity of Grahamstown. The white town of Grahamstown is the English 1820 Settlers' Association showpiece answer to the Afrikaner Voortrekker Monument at Pretoria. Soldiers and armored vehicles had taken the place of cultural festival visitors.

It was only when, closer to home, Soweto became a hell to which Johannesburg's black workers returned each night as best they could (buses would not venture farther than Soweto boundaries) that white faces in Johannesburg became strained. Until then, most whites in South Africa were in a state of anguish over the outcome of the New Zealand Government's determination to stop a rugby team's tour of South Africa.

The minority within the white minority did not have to wait for any declaration to be aware of an emergency beyond the nation's rugby fields. Some leaders had been warning for months that an uprising was inevitable; built into the new Constitution as its own consequence. Outstanding among them were Bishop Desmond M. Tutu; the Rev. Beyers Naudé, general secretary of the South African Council of Churches, and the Rev. Allan Boesak, president of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and a founder of the United Democratic Front—who was detained in August on the eve of an illegal protest march and the widespread violence that followed.

Also there was Sheena Duncan of the Black Sash—a women's organization that has done more than any other source to expose the appalling forced removals of black rural people. Government policy has meant that in the past 25 years, one in ten blacks has been moved to make way for whites.

The Government was arresting trade union leaders and leaders of the United Democratic Front, an organization which recognizes no racial or color distinctions and stands for a unitary state in South Africa. And just as, abroad, one may mutter abhorrence of apartheid and go on funding it morally and materially, so the Government was busy reiterating a litany of dedication to consultation and change, while arresting almost every black leader with any claim to be consulted about change.

On the minority side of the dividing line between white and white, a new organization had grown in urgent response to the deployment of 7,000 troops against the people of the black township of Sebokeng, 40 miles south of Johannesburg, last October. This force included young army recruits. Resistance to conscription—while still rare—was suddenly no longer some fringe defection on religious grounds by a handful of Seventh-day Adventists, but a wave of revulsion against "defending one's country" by maiming, killing and breaking into the humble homes of black people.

In this horrifying domestic context, a group called the End Conscription Campaign held a three-day gathering in Johannesburg. A large crowd of young men and their families debated the moral issues of conscientious objection and defined their position not as pacifist but as a refusal to defend apartheid.

I gave a reading there of poetry by South African writers, black and white, in whose work, like that of playwrights, lately, resistance to military service has been the theme. The subject has to be handled gingerly, whether in poetry or platform prose; it is a treasonable offense in South Africa to incite anyone to refuse military service. The E.C.C. is not yet a mass movement, and maybe will not become one, but the Government is sufficiently alarmed by it to have detained several members.

Again, there is a strange historical twinship. Even after 1960, when the South African revolution may be said to have begun, the sons of liberal and left-wing families docilely accepted, force majeure, the obligation to do military service, if with a sense of resentment and shame. At the same time, whites who support black liberation have long wondered why blacks have not turned significantly against the informers and collaborators among their own people.

Now, young whites have a last found the courage to fulfill the chief provision blacks demand of them if they are to prove their commitment to the black cause: to refuse to fight to protect racism. Meanwhile, young blacks themselves have reached the stage of desperation that leads them to hunt down and destroy those who are their own people in terms of skin, but not loyalty.

Both developments—the first positive, the second tragic—are the direct result of the new Constitution. The blacks were not consulted about it, rejected it, and are now in a continuous state of rebellion, out of bottomless frustration at finding themselves finally cast out, in civic and even physical terms, from their own country. The Government deals with this rebellion by sending in white soldiers to terrorize blacks into temporary submission; young whites are confronted with the loathsome "duty" it was surely always clear racism eventually would demand.

For years, when one asked blacks why they allowed black policy to raid and arrest them, they would answer: "Our brothers have to do what whites tell them. We are all victims together." Now, black youths are confronted with what surely always was clear would be the ultimate distortion of their lives by apartheid: brothers, co-opted as police informers and city dignitaries by white power, becoming enemies.

Many of us who belong to the minority within the minority already were accustomed, before the state of emergency, to using the telephone for the kind of call not made outside thriller movies in your country.

When the South African Defence Force raided the capital of one of our neighoring countries, Botswana, earlier this year, we feared for the lives of black and white friends living in exile there.

For some days, we could piece together their fate only by exchanging guarded word-of-mouth news. For my fellow writer, Sipho Sepamia, the news was bad. He traveled across the border to Botwsana to the funeral of a relative murdered in the raid. We were nervous about his doing so, since the brutal raid—which resulted in indisciminate killing, so that even children died—was purportedly against African National Congress revolutionaries, and the demonstration of any connection with even random victims could rub off as guilt by association.

With the beginning of the state of emergency came mass arrests, and severe penalties of revealing without authority the identity of any detainee. The names we know are confined to those permitted by the police to be published. Who can say how many others there are? So our ominous kind of morning gossip has increased—and there remains the fear that the individual one calls may not answer because he or she has been taken.

Some of us have friends among those who are the accused in the treason trials in session or about to commence, mainly trade unionists and leaders of the United Democratic Front. I telephone my old friend, Cassim Saloojee, a social worker and an officer in the United Democratic Front. He is at home on bail after many weeks of detention before being formally charged with treason. One discovers, these days, that genuine cheerfulness exists, and it is a byproduct of courage. He has only one complaint, which is expressed in a way that catches me out—"I've been spending my time watching pornographic films," he says.

With my tactfully unshockable laugh, I sudddenly remember that active resistance to apartheid is "political pornography." The films he has been viewing are video cassettes of public meetings made by the United Democratic Front as records of their activities. They have been seized by the state. For the purposes of their own defense, the accused must study what may now be used as evidence against them. "Ninety hours of viewing. . . ."

The case is sub judice, so I suppose I cannot give here my version of whether the particular meetings I attended (the U.D.F. is a nonracial, nonviolent and legally-constituted movement) could possibly be construed as violent and treasonous, but I hope that among all that footage there is at least recorded the time when the crowd in a Johannesburg hall heard that there was police harassment of some supporters in the foyer, and, from the platform, Cassim Saloojee succeeded in preventing the crowd from streaming out to seek a confrontation that doubtless would have resulted in police violence.

While writing this letter, I have received a call from Colin Coleman, a young white student at the University of the Witwatersrand, down the road, himself a veteran of detention. His brother is now in detention for the second time.

At last, after more than two weeks, Colin Coleman's parents have managed to get permission to visit Neil Coleman in prison. Like well over a thousand others, he has not been charged. The parents are founder members of the well-established Detainees' Parents Support Committee. This title and status indicate the enduring state of mind that prevails among white people like these, stoic but unintimidatedly active on the part of all prisoners of conscience, black and white, whether or not in the family.

Colin called to ask me to take part in a panel discussion on South African culture to be held by the students' Academic Freedom Committee. Irrelevant while we are in a state of emergency? Concurrently with engagement in the political struggle for the end of apartheid, there exists an awareness of the need for a new conception of culture, particularly among whites. Young people like Colin Coleman are aware that a change of consciousness, of the white sense of self, has to be achieved along with a change of regime, if, when blacks do sit down to consult with whites, there is to be anything to talk about.

The arts in South Africa sometimes do bear relation to the real entities of South African life in the way that the euphemisms and evasions of white politics do not. This is increasingly evident in the bold themes explored by blacks and whites in South Africa's theater and literature.

These are the states of mind of the majority of white South Africans, and of the minority within the white population. Within the first group, the majority, the preoccupations of the second are no more than newspaper stories you, too, read thousands of miles away: so long as the Caspir armored monsters patrol the black townships and even mass funerals are banned, the majority feel safe, since there is no possibility that they may be imprisoned for a too-active sense of justice, or find any member of their families or their friends in detention, on trial, or in danger of losing a life in right-wing terrorist attacks. There isn't any possibility that one of their lawyers might be gunned down, as was Victoria Mxenge, a member of a treason trial defense team, outside her home near Durban in July.

The conditions of life, for whites, are a different matter. Even those few whites who have members of their families in prison themselves continue to wake up every morning as I do, to the song of weaver birds and the mechanical-sounding whir of crested barbets in a white suburb. Soweto is only eight miles from my house; if I did not have friends living there, I should not be aware of the battles of stones against guns and tear gas that are going on in its streets, for images on a TV screen come by satellite as easily from the other side of the world as from eight miles away, and may be comprehended as equally distanced from the viewer. How is it possible that the winter sun is shining, the randy doves are announcing spring, the domestic workers from the backyards are placing bets on Fah Fee, the numbers game, with the Chinese runner, as usual every afternoon?

In terms of ways of life, conditions of daily living are sinisterly much the same of all whites, those who manage to ignore the crisis in our country, and those of whom it is the determining state of mind. Some go to protest meetings; others play golf. All of us go home to quiet streets, outings to the theater and cinema, good meals and secure shelter for the night. Meanwhile, in the black townships, thousands of children no longer go to school, fathers and sons disappear into police vans or lie shot in the dark streets, social gatherings are around coffins and social intercourse is confined to mourning.

The night the state of emergency was declared, I was at a party held at an alternative education center, the Open School, in the downtown area where banks and the glass palaces of mining companies run down into Indian stores and black bus queues. The school is directed by Colin and Dolphine Smuts (black, despite their Afrikaans surname), for black youths and children who study drama, painting, dance and music there—subjects not offered by Government's "Bantu" education. The occasion was a celebration: the school, which had been in danger of closure for lack of funds, was to receive a Ford Foundation grant. Colin had not known until the evening began whether the new ban gatherings might not be served on the celebration. Dolphine had gone ahead and prepared food.

There were polite speeches, music, drumming and the declamatory performance of poetry that has been part of resistance rhetoric since young people began to compose in prison during the Soweto uprisings in 1976 and which sets such gatherings apart from their counterparts in other countries. Soweto was sealed off by military roadblocks. Yet the black guests had come through somehow, thoroughly frisked in the "elegantly casual" clothes we all, black and white, wear to honor this kind of occasion. I asked a couple I had not met before what it was like to be in Soweto now, looking at them in the inhibited, slightly awed way one tries not to reveal to people who have emerged alive from some unimaginable ordeal. The man took a bite from a leg of chicken and washed it down with his drink. "In your street, one day it's all right. The next day, you can cross the street when a Caspir comes round the corner, and you'll die. It's like Beirut."

Yes, if you want to know what it's like here, it's more like Beirut than he knew. I remember a film I once saw, where the camera moved from destruction and its hateful cacophony in the streets to a villa where people were lunching on a terrace, and there were birds and flowers. That's what it's like. I also remember something said by a character in a novel I wrote ten years ago. "How long can we go on getting away scot free?"

THE EMERGING TRADE ISSUE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, September 11, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE EMERGING TRADE ISSUE

Trade is moving to the front rank of congressional issues for the first time since early in this century. Several developments have led to the increased interest. Our trade deficit is nearing $150 billion for 1985, and continues to spiral upward. In fact, the U.S. has become a debtor nation for the first time since 1914. Exporting industries, including agriculture, have been hit especially hard. Foreign governments erect barriers to our goods while flooding the U.S. with their exports. Much of our industrial capacity is being moved overseas. Lack of competitiveness by American industries is emerging as our central economic problem.

The reasons for our trade problems are clear. The high value of the dollar, caused largely by huge budget deficits, makes American goods expensive abroad and foreign imports cheap. Growth in American manufacturing productivity has also declined. Growth in productivity in Japan, France, and Germany greatly exceeded U.S. growth from 1980-83. Only about ⅔ of the manufacturing jobs lost in the last recession have been regained, and another 220,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in 1985 alone. Our recent economic recovery preceded that of our major trading partners, leading to sluggish export growth for American companies. The cost of capital is about twice as much in the U.S. as in Japan, and our edge in research and development has eroded. Our educational system has lagged in producing high technology graduates and we have failed to pay sufficient attention to production technology, often leading in basic technology but failing to commercialize it. Huge debt levels in developing countries have forced them to cut back on imports, many of which come from the U.S. One study estimated that the drop in U.S. exports to Latin America cost 800,000 jobs in the U.S.

Foreign governments also use a variety of methods to help their industries and handicap U.S. companies in their markets. These range from overt methods, such as national purchasing policies and direct export subsidies, to more subtle means such as complicated customs rules and arbitrary product standards. There has also been a steady shift toward "bilateralism" and "managed trade." Nations now agree to open their markets to limited quantities of one another's products and to exclude those from all other countries.

For many years U.S. trade policy has been based on "comparative advantage," the idea that countries trade best in the goods they make best and cheapest. But this is true only in a competitive system of free trade. It may not work in a world where governments interfere heavily in the market place, internaitonal competition is sharp, currencies are misaligned, and huge debt restricts growth in developing countries.

Congress has traditionally been reluctant to get involved in trade policy. It usually asks the President to make more vigorous use of his powers to negotiate with other countries. There is a growing sense in Congress, however, that the administration does not have an effective trade policy. Congress views the world trade system as biased in favor of foreign competition. It sees trading rules that allow some countries to trade here with relative freedom compared to the way U.S. goods are treated in those ocuntries. As more industries demand that Congress protect them from foreign competition, pressure is growing for direct action to slow imports. About 300 protectionist bills have been introduced in Congress, and at least one of them has a good chance of passage. For the moment, the measures face major obstacles, from the tight congressional schedule to a likely presidential veto.

To forestall passage of protectionist legislation, the President is moving toward a more aggressive international trade policy. It is unclear what specific steps he will take, however. The administration is split between those who want to maintain as free a trade policy as possible and those who feel that years of negotiating have resulted only in record trade deficits and loss of manufacturing competitiveness. Congress will respond to effective leadership. It wants the President to be tougher, but it also knows that it cannot force a trade policy upon him. The President must exercise strong leadership, and he must do it soon or his options will disappear.

The President can take several steps to help in the short term. At the least, ways must be found to open foreign markets to U.S. products. Congress is insisting on greater reciprocity in U.S. foreign trade. The President must invoke our trade laws aggressively to guarantee fair dealings with our trading partners. American trade laws must be modified to make it easier for American industry and workers to get relief. "Adjustment plans" to give companies and workers time to adapt to changed market conditions must be encouraged. Some industries may have to be protected temporarily through the use of import surcharges or quotas to allow them to modernize and become competitive.

In the longer term, we must address the fundamental causes of our trade problems. The best trade policy is a sound econmic policy. We must reduce the federal deficit and bring the dollar back into line with other currencies. We must accelerate our own productivity growth, which is far behind that of our principal competitors. We must also work to improve economic growth in developing countries. It is in our interest, as well as that of other developed countries, for developing countries to be able to purchase goods and services. We also cannot ignore unfair trading practices. We must work to build a fair, efficient sytem of world trade. The President must push hard for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. We should also work to include under international rules trade in services, which is not now covered. Exchange rate instabilities must be reduced. The time has come to explore much closer coordination of national economic policies. No solution to trade problems is possible without the will of the Western nations to work together towards joint solutions. For that to happen, the U.S. must exercise strong leadership. One thing is certain: a harder U.S. trade policy will emerge in the coming months.

H.R. 2970: EXPLANATION AND ANALYSIS

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, prior to the August recess I introduced H.R. 2970, legislation which would amend the Packers and Stockyards Act to extend the jurisdiction of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Packers and Stockyards Administration to the poultry industry, primarily the broiler industry. The following is an analysis and background review of H.R. 2970, prepared by the Congressional Research Service:

ANALYSIS

INTRODUCTION

The basic intent of H.R. 2970 is to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, as amended (7 U.S.C. 181), to extend the jurisdiction of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's (USDA) Packers and Stockyards Administration (P&SA) to the poultry industry, primarily the broiler industry. This report gives a brief legislative history of the P&S Act, discusses the major features of the proposed bill, and presents the views of the various groups that would be affected by the proposal if it became law. A side-by-side comparison of current law and H.R. 2970 is attached.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY[1]

The Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 was intended to cover livestock markets, the meat packing industry, and meat packers' poultry operations. The latter constituted the majority of the commercial poultry trade, and tended to be located throughout the country at livestock terminals. The meat packers' role declined, however, as live poultry marketing centralized and shifted to large metropolitan areas. Poultry dealers in those areas were not considered "packers" under the 1921 Act. As their marketing operations grew, metropolitan poultry dealers complained about unfair and deceptive practices in the industry. As a result, Congress amended the Packers and Stockyards Act in 1935 by adding Title V, which was intended to extend the Act's jurisdiction to all persons engaged in marketing live poultry in commerce.

Since the end of World War II, the poultry industry has changed from one of small, independent producers, into a highly integrated industry in which about 95 percent of broiler production occurs under growout contracts, or poultry growing arrangements. Under these arrangements, growers provide buildings, equipment, and labor; contractors, or integrators, provide the birds and the feed, process the birds, and market the end product.

After a P&SA study of the industry showed that the grower's bargaining position with integrators was limited, P&SA issued detailed poultry regulations in 1971. The regulations are designed to prohibit unfair practices in marketing poultry or in acquiring poultry from producers or growers. Currently, P&SA's regulation of the industry involves assuring that there are written contracts between growers and integrators; assuring that integrators provide full and complete accounting on contracts with growers to raise the poultry; assuring that scales have been tested and weigh accurately; assuring that poultry is weighed promptly and that weighing scale tickets are provided to producers; and preventing retroactively reduced contract payment terms and assuring that payments are made in accordance with contract terms.

PROPOSED CHANGES TO PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT

Many industry analysis believe that Congress' intent in adding Title V to the Packers and Stockyards Act in 1935 was to give P&SA the same degree of authority over the poultry industry as it already had over the red meat packing industry. However, subsequent changes to the livestock sections of the Act did not include specific language pertaining to the poultry industry. Furthermore, the total restructuring of the industry that occurred in the 1950's and 1960's left the language of the 1935 amendment open to many different interpretations.

The rationale behind H.R. 2970 is that the poultry industry should be entitled to the same protections that have been extended to producers in other financially hazardous markets—namely, livestock producers under the Packers and Stockyards Act, and fruit and vegetable growers under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act (7 U.S.C. 499a-499s).

In essence, H.R. 2970 would add the poultry industry as it is currently structured to the language of the 1921 Act. The major provisions of the bill are prompt payment; a trust to assure payment to growers in the event of poultry firm bankruptcy; and authorization for P&SA to bring disciplinary proceedings against violators through administrative channels within the U.S. Department of Agriculture, not just through the Department of Justice as is currently the case.

Three major groups would be affected by the changes this bill would bring about if passed: the poultry growers, as represented by the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation; the integrated slaughtering/processing firms, as represented by the National Broiler Council and the National Turkey Federation; and the Packers and Stockyards Administration.

With regard to the prompt pay provision, the poultry growers—both independents and those on contract to large vertically integrated firms—claim the need for prompt payment protection under law, especially as a result of recent poultry firm bankruptcies that have caused severe financial losses for some growers. According to both P&SA and the National Broiler Council, most firms pay their growers on time. However, P&SA and the poultry growers strongly believe that protection is necessary in those cases where there are problems.

The National Broiler Council and National Turkey Federation would support a prompt-pay provision only if the law would also clearly limit P&SA's monitoring of processors' contracts with independent growers. P&SA and a second circuit court of appeals panel have interpreted the current law to give the agency authority to review these agreements. The processor/integrator associations disagree with this interpretation.

The Council and the Federation are also opposed to the trust provision of the proposed legislation, claiming that banks and other lending institutions would be less willing to finance poultry processors knowing that some assets would be held in trust for repaying growers in the event of bankruptcy. Livestock producers have had the benefit of such a trust provision since 1976, and according to P&SA, there has been no notable lack of financing in the meat packing industry since the provision has been in effect.

Opinion is also divided on the proposal to give P&SA authority to bring disciplinary actions against violators through administrative proceedings within USDA. The National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation say that, although they dislike the idea of expanding Federal regulation, poultry growers should have the same protection that livestock producers do. The benefits they cite are greater recourse in the case of unfair business practices, and speedier action through administrative channels than through the Department of Justice. P&SA says that since many packing firms now handle both red and "white" (poultry) meat, many of their disciplinary actions would be combined, and would not require budget or staff increases for the agency. According to P&SA, being able to handle complaints administratively instead of having to go through the Department of Justice would actually reduce costs. Furthermore, P&SA says that being able to take administrative action to correct small violations would permit the agency to better target the agency resources needed to pursue larger cases through the Department of Justice.

The National Broiler Council, representing processors, does not wish to see P&SA's jurisdiction expanded. It interprets the current law as authorizing P&SA to review live-poultry transactions only—sales of old breeding stock or old laying hens to firms for slaughter and processing. This accounts for only a small fraction of all transactions in the broiler and layer industry. The Council believes that the poultry industry is not in need of any additional regulation, and that any disagreements between growers and processors can be worked out under their contracts, without Government intervention.

[Background]

H.R. 2970, LEGISLATION AMENDING THE PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT OF 1921 TO INCLUDE THE POULTRY INDUSTRY

TITLE I—DEFINITIONS

Adds specific definitions for the terms "poultry," "poultry product," "poultry grower," "poultry growing arrangement," and "live poultry dealer" to cover the entire poultry industry as it is currently structured.

TITLE II—PACKERS

SEC. 201—Adds language to provide that poultry slaughterers and poultry product processors, brokers, dealers and distributors would be treated the same as red meat firms under the act.

SEC. 202—Removes references to poultry handlers because the position no longer exists in the poultry industry, and clarifies that poultry dealers would be treated the same as red meat packers if found restraining commerce or creating a monopoly.

SEC. 203—Adds the term "live poultry dealer" to the section, which would make poultry firms subject to the same administrative action that USDA can currently take against red meat packers under this section.

SEC. 204—Adds the term "live poultry dealer" to Sec. 204 and Sec. 205, which clarifies that the provisions of these sections apply to poultry firms as well as to read meat packers.

SEC. 206—Creates a new section (Sec. 207) that gives trust protection to poultry sellers and growers like that provided for livestock sellers in Sec. 206. Also prohibits liens or other security interests on unpaid-for birds.

TITLE III—STOCKYARDS

SEC. 308—Adds language specifically giving poultry growers and sellers the same rights as livestock producers and buyers under this section.

TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 401-407—No change other than to delete the obsolete term "handlers" where it appears.

SEC. 408—Adds specific language on failure to pay for poultry or poultry products, or failure to pay accounts due under poultry growing contracts. This would provide for court injunctions against poultry firms the same as against red meat firms.

SEC. 409(a)—Creates a new Section 410, of which subsection (a) requires poultry dealers or packers buying live poultry for cash to make payment before the close of the next business day. Also requires live poultry dealers or packers obtaining live birds under a poultry growing contract to make full payment before the close of the seventh business day following the week of slaughter.

SEC. 409(b)—New subsection (b) permits credit extensions only between growers and purchasers engaging in real cash sales. Transactions under poultry growing arrangements and marketing agreements with independent growers would have to be completed within the time limits stipulated under subsection (a).

SEC. 409(c)—New subsection (c) would make any attempt to delay payment to poultry growers or sellers an "unfair practice" in violation of the Act.

TITLE V—LIVE POULTRY DEALERS AND HANDLERS

Title V is deleted because the provisions of H.R. 2970 would render them obsolete.

Adds specific language that would give USDA authority to halt the operations of insolvent poultry processors or allow them to continue only under certain prescribed conditions. Insolvency or processors involved in poultry growing arrangements would be covered by Sec. 206 and Sec. 410 of the Act, as amended by H.R. 2970. Bonding of persons engaged in buying poultry would not be required.

I would urge my colleagues to review the merits of this legislation and consider cosponsorship of H.R. 2970.

IMPORTS AND THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, together with nearly 300 of my colleagues, I am a cosponsor of the Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985.

I would like to commend a recent article which appeared in the August 31, 1985, Washington Post, to those colleagues and friends who are not cosponsors of this legislation. Perhaps some areas of question might be clarified by this eloquent piece authored by two of our distinguished colleagues, Representatives JENKINS and BROYHILL.

I request that the text of the article be inserted in the RECORD at this point:

IMPORTS ARE KILLING THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

The American fiber, textile and apparel industry and its 2 million workers face a crisis that not only threatens the industry's survival but dramatizes problems besetting our entire economy. The crisis can be summed up in a single word: "imports"—imports that have doubled in the last five years; imports that account for more than half the clothing consumers buy; imports that have cut industry jobs by 300,000 since 1979; imports that last year accounted for $16 billion of our trade deficit.

So it is difficult to understand the arguments of our colleague, Rep. Ed Zschau (R-Calif.), in opposing legislation to control the flood of imports ["Protection Isn't the Answer for Textiles and Apparel," op-ed, Aug. 13]. Zschau opposes the "Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985," which we and 289 of our House colleagues plus 54 senators are proud to co-sponsors.

Measured against the severity of the import crisis, this legislation must be judged extremely modest.

First, it permanently concedes nearly 40 percent of the U.S. apparel market to imports. Autos, steel and semiconductors have never approached such import penetration.

Second, it continues to let imports grow faster than U.S. consumption.

Third, while the legislation does cut back on imports from major producing countries such as Japan, Korea, Brazil, Hong Kong and Taiwan, it accelerates import growth from developing countries such as Bangladesh that most need access to our markets.

Zschau asserts that the Multi-Fiber Arrangement (MFA), the multilateral structure for ensuring orderly textile and apparel trade, "has been an effective regulator of bilateral textile trade for years." Such a statement reveals an ignorance of the facts.

Last year imports grew 32 percent; in the last five years they have grown 100 percent. That kind of "effective regulator" will put the U.S. industry out of business by the early 1990s.

The sad litany of import-induced job losses, plant closings and devasted communities contrasts sharply with the industry's efforts to compete. Every year since 1970, the U.S. textile industry has invested at least $1 billion in modernization—$1.7 billion last year alone. Today, the U.S. textile and apparel industry is the most productive in the world.

Zschau says that improved productivity is the reason for rising unemployment in the industry. That is a myth. With imports growing far beyond consumption increases, it's obvious what has caused the loss of jobs.

Modernization of the industry in full cooperation with labor has, so far, allowed it to survive in the face of abysmally low wages and unfair trading practices in many exporting nations. Given the flood of imports, however, it is hard to see how companies can continue this vigorous commitment to capital spending. And it is impossible to see where displaced workers—well over half of whom are women and minorities, many in rural areas—will find alternative job opportunities.

The cruelest hoax of all is Zschau's assertion that consumers will suffer if imports are controlled. How could they suffer if they don't benefit from imports now? In department stores and mail order catalogs identical garments made in several countries—including the United States—often sell at exactly the same price. Where is the consumer benefit?

Zschau's misunderstanding of the basic facts is not surprising. He relied on data from the International Business and Economic Research Corporation, a Washington firm that is a registered foreign agent and lobbyist for at least 14 foreign governments and associations that account for nearly half of the textile and apparel imports into the United States.

The current system of controls on fiber, textile and apparel has collapsed—because of flaws in the system combined with lack of enforcement. We hope Zschau will come to see the wisdom of this legislation as he has seen the wisdom of supporting the Wine Equity Act and the trade actions taken by the semiconductor industry, both aimed at controlling imports. Wine and semiconductors are big business in California, but so are cotton production (the largest cash crop in the state) and the apparel industry (with 110,000 workers and a payroll of $1.1 billion).

THE DANGERS OF MARIJUANA USE

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, as Congress reconvenes to take up its legislative agenda, I must take a moment, as chairman of the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, to report on what seems to be increasing convergence of thinking as to the dangers posed by the smoking of marijuana. While the chemistry and metabolism of marijuana are technical subjects they are important bases from which to begin.

Contrary to popular belief, the plant material of cannabis sativa, the marijuana plant, is quite complex, containing at least 421 individual compounds. Sixty-one of the chemicals which have been identified in the plant, cannabinoids, are specific to cannabis. Ten of these are now routinely quantified in identifying cannabis samples. When smoked, some of the chemicals are further transformed by burning into still other compounds.

Cannabis plant material differs widely in the amount of the principal psychoactive ingredient — delta-9-tetrahydrocannabinol, THC for short—contained, as well as in the proportions of other chemicals. Although the effects of cannabinoids other than delta-9-THC have been studied, much remains to be learned about their effects, both singly and in interaction with another. While, for many practical purposes, the percentage of delta-9-THC is a useful guide to the psychoactivity of a drug sample, other chemical ingredients may ultimately prove to be important in modifying THC's effects as well as because of their own impact on the body. A good deal of valuable basic research has been done on THC, but it should be emphasized that it is only one ingredient of the natural material.

However, while many of the questions associated with marijuana abuse remain unanswered, I agree with the conclusions of Dr. Norman H. Edelman, scientific consultant to the American Lung Association and a professor at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey-Rutgers University Medical School. He stated in a recent column in USA Today that smoking marijuana is harful to the lungs and has the potential to cause lung disease among other pulmonary ill effects.

Most frightening in light of the recent findings as to the dangers associated with smoking marijuana, is that the select committee estimates that some 25 million people in the United States regularly use marijuana and as many as 40 million may be occasional users. A recent Ladies Home Journal survey reported that of the 86,000 readers contacted, 41 percent of the women under 25 indicated they are regular users of marijuana. Further, availability is at record levels nationwide as is the THC content of both the foreign and domestic product.

Dr. Edelman offers a timely and incisive analysis of the risks undertaken by those who smoke marijuana. I ask that his column be printed in the RECORD.

The column follows:

[From the USA Today, Aug. 9-11, 1985]

MARIJUANA USE POSES DANGER TO YOUR HEALTH

(By Norman H. Edelman)

The American Lung Association has reviewed the body of knowledge about marijuana accumulated over the last 15 years and has concluded that smoking marijuana is harmful to the lungs and has the potential to cause lung disease such as chronic bronchitis, emphysema and lung cancer.

The main psychoactive ingedient of marijuana, delta-9-tetra-hydrocannabinol (THC), which is responsible for the "high" is a fat-soluble substance that is stored in areas of high fat content, such as the lungs, liver, brain and reproductive organs. Five to seven days after smoking marijuana, half the dosage of THC is still present in the body—it can take up to a month for THC to leave the body completely.

Marijuana smoke contains more respiratory irritants than tobacco smoke and a 50 percent higher concentration of cancer-causing agent benzpyrene and benzanthracene.

Marijuana cigarettes have 12 times the "tar" and can generate 10 to 20 times as much carbon monoxide as tobacco cigarettes. Delicate lung tissue receives greater exposure to these harmful chemicals because marijuana smokers inhale more deeply and hold the smoke in their lungs longer.

Chronic marijuana smoking inflames the air passages and may lead to pharyngitis, sinusitis, and bronchitis. Young, heavy smokers of hashish and marijuana develop microscopic abnormalities in the cells lining their larger air passages, ordinarily seen only in older people who have smoked tobacco for 10 to 15 years.

These are the same abnormalities seen in people who develop lung cancer.

Smoking marijuana can impair the function of the special "defense" cells known as aveolar macrophages, which fight off infection in the lungs. Chronic marijuana smokers are more vulnerable to lung infections such as pneumonia, influenza, and the common cold.

Marijuana smoking is particularly hazardous for young people, whose lungs are still growing. The surgeon general has stated that marijuana smoking at this critical stage can also disrupt the normal development and functioning the cardiovascular, central nervous, reproductive, and immune systems.

Much more remains to be learned about the biologic effects of marijuana. It is well known that the progress of lung diseases is insidious, appearing slowly over many years. The full destructive impact of marijuana smoking on health has not yet been fully determined.

CONSUMER AND HOMEMAKING EDUCATION

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, the home and family have been Federal priorities since the birth of our Nation. From early vocational education legislation to the Carl Perkins Vocational Education Act of 1984, Public Law 98-524, funding has been allocated for home economics education which focuses on strengthening of family life. Vocational consumer and homemaking education prepares youth and adults for the work of the home and family—the occupation of homemaking. These programs address the critical needs of persons to be equipped with basic living skills, and need to remain a priority if persons are to be wise consumers, productive workers, and effective family members. One example of the effectiveness of consumer and homemaking education is demonstrated through a recent assessment of student achievement of those competencies deemed necessary to perform effectively in the occupation of homemaker.

Consumer and homemaking education is planned instructional programs, services, and activities which prepare youth and adults for the occupation of homemaking and wage-earning occupations. The areas of instruction include human development and the family, consumer education, nutrition and food, clothing and textiles, housing and home management, and family and individual health. Professionals pride themselves in meeting the special needs of youth in public schools and underserved populations, for example, by offering programs in economically depressed areas, prisons, mental health facilities, and other centers of the disadvantaged and handicapped.

Consumer and homemaking education promotes educational excellence through innovative curriculum development, teacher education, research, and leadership programs of the Future Homemakers of America Vocational Student Organization. Evaluation of student learning as a result of their participation in these programs remains an integral part of consumer and homemaking education.

In Missouri, which I have the privilege of representing, it has been documented that students in consumer and homemaking programs attain competencies needed for the occupation of homemaking. A competency is knowledge, attitudes, and performance skills which enable one to function effectively in a specific occupation. As part of a larger project, a competency based test was developed to ascertain students' knowledge and attitudes related to the tasks performed in the homemaker occupation. This effort was sponsored by the home economics education section of the Missouri Department of Elementary and Secondary Education and conducted by the Southeast Missouri State University.

Last year, students in a sample of the 381 school districts with consumer and homemaking education programs participated in a statewide assessment of their competencies for the roles of the homemaker. I would like to highlight some of the results.

High schools seniors who had 1 year of instruction in consumer and homemaking education scored significantly higher in terms of knowledge about the occupation than students just beginning their first year of instruction in consumer and homemaking education. Students with four or more semesters of instruction had greater knowledge of the tasks of the homemaker than students with less instruction.

In terms of their attitudes toward the occupation of homemaker, seniors with comprehensive consumer and homemaking education instruction held significantly more positive attitudes than those students beginning their coursework. Seniors with no consumer and homemaking education instruction held the least favorable attitudes. Students who had taken four semesters of comprehensive consumer and homemaking education were more favorable toward the occupation than those with less coursework.

Missouri's consumer and homemaking education programs do have an impact in guiding youth to attain competencies for the homemaker occupation. I would like to commend professionals for being on target in promoting economic growth, individual productivity, strengthened home and family life, and community outreach to underserved populations, and wish them future successes in accomplishing consumer and homemaking education program goals.

LITHUANIAN AMERICANS OF CICERO, IL

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to share with my colleagues a resolution adopted by the Lithuanian Americans of Cicero, Ill, commemorating the Holocaust of the night of June 14, 1941, and the continuing genocide by the Soviet Union since 1940 against the Lithuanian people:

RESOLUTION

We, the Lithuanian Americans of Cicero, Illinois assembled this 9th day of June, 1935 at St. Anthony Parish Hall to commemorate the Holocaust of the night of June 14, 1941 and continuing genocide by the Soviet Union since 1940 against the Lithuanian people.

On the night of June 14, 1941 more than 40,000 Lithuanians were deported to Soviet concentration and labor camps where they perished from hunger and cold. At the end of World War II, more than one quarter of the Lithuanian population was exiled to Soviet concentration camps. Even today many Lithuanians suffer imprisonment and persecution for trying to exercise their human rights.

Now, be it resolved, That we agree with President Ronald Reagan's military program and ask Congress for its support; in particular Nicaraguan and Afghanistan freedom fighters;

We congratulate President Ronald Reagan on his trip to Europe to strengthen the ties between Americans and the free countries of Europe;

We ask the President and Congress to appoint a special commission to investigate the OSI activities as related to the constitutional rights of the accused and the OSI connection and cooperation with the KGB and other Soviet institutions;

We ask the President to make public the secret agreements that were made between the OSI and the Soviet government. We ask all representatives to support the Baltic Freedom Day Resolution that has been passed by the Senate (HJ263).

We request that this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, Vice President, Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Presidential Council, United States Senators from Illinois, Chairman of Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Congressman from our district, Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, other appropriate Congressional committees, and the news media.

STANLEY DUBAUSKAS,
Secretary of the Meeting.
ANDRIUS JUSKEVICIUS,
President of the Cicero Chapter of Lithuanian American Council and Chairperson of the Meeting.

THE SOVIETS BLINDSIDE U.S. MONITORING EFFORTS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, once again, the Soviets are playing dirty pool. Rather than complying with both the letter and the spirit of the SALT II accords, they are encrypting valuable transmissions from their missiles. They hope to foil any U.S. monitoring efforts of those important missile test flights. If any real understanding and arms control accords are to be agreed to by our two nations, encryption efforts of this type must be stopped. Using trickery is no way to promote trust and confidence. I want to commend an article on this subject to my colleagues in the Congress so that all of us can see the implications of these unfortunate test coding efforts.

In any international accords dealing with arms control, verification is a key element. While limited data encryption of missile telemetry is allowed under the SALT II accords, the agreement prohibits coding that hinders a nation's ability to verify compliance with certain critical provisions. Equally disturbing are allegations that the Soviet Union is building warheads, bombers and new missiles far in excess of the limits specified in the original treaty.

All in all, many Soviet activities regarding signed agreements generally undermine the fragile trust and confidence that has been building between our two nations in recent years. Soviet violations of the Helsinki Final Act are so blatant that many wonder if the Kremlin is capable of following the spirit and letter of any agreement. This is a serious question which must be asked by any administration intent on reducing the high levels of nuclear arms in the arsenals of our two countries.

With these deep concerns in mind, I recommend the following Washington Times article to my colleagues in the Congress. It is certainly food for thought:

SOVIET TEST CODING STYMIES U.S. MONITORING EFFORTS

(By Bill Gertz)

Soviet coding of missile test data has prevented the United States from identifying the characteristics of new and modernized ballistic missile systems and has created barriers for future arms treaties, a secret 1984 report on Soviet arms control violations says.

Critics opposed to spending enormous sums on U.S. technical spy systems to monitor Soviet missiles charge that the coding—called missile telemetry encryption—is an example of how the Soviet Union exploited U.S.-Soviet cooperation during the 1970s.

The report on "Soviet Non-Compliance with Arms Control Agreements" contains details of U.S.-Soviet diplomatic exchanges on the issue and reveals that the encryption has left U.S. spy systems unprepared to provide adequate verification of past arms control limits on intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The Reagan administration entered arms talks with the Soviet Union last March with public assurances that any agreements would be verifiable. Secretary of State George Shultz, in May 1984, stated that "provisions for effective verification of compliance by all parties" is a basic U.S. objective in the arms talks.

Regarding treaty compliance in Soviet missile tests of new SS-24 and SS-25 ICBMs and SSN-20 submarine-launched ICBMs, the report states that "in none of these cases are there alternative, normally available sources of data, a fact of which we must assume the Soviets are aware."

U.S. diplomats at a Geneva arms control commission warned the Soviets that telemetry encryption presents a "serious obstacle" to reaching any new arms agreements with the Soviets, the report states.

"Such encryption impairs the U.S. capabilities to verify compliance with key provisions of the SALT II Treaty, particularly those parts . . . establishing permissible characteristics of new and modernized ICBMs," the report says.

The SALT II treaty was signed in 1979 but never ratified by Congress. While questions of verification have persisted, both sides have agreed not to undercut the treaty's provisions. The treaty permits some telemetry encryption but prohibits coding that hinders the ability to verify compliance with certain provisions, such as limits on warhead-to-launcher weight ratios.

President Reagan reported to Congress in June that the United States will continue its "no undercut" policy and ordered the Pentagon to prepare a report by November outlining possible U.S. countermeasures to reported Soviet arms violations.

In addition to violating curbs on encryption, the Soviets also have been accused of building warheads, bombers, new missiles and defense systems beyond treaty levels.

Telemetry is data broadcast from computers located in missile nose cones to ground control centers during test flights. If left uncoded, it can provide details on missile size and accuracy.

The report reveals how Soviet negotiators to the Geneva Standing Consultative Commission on arms control dismissed U.S. objections to telemetry encryption. An unnamed Soviet commissioner, when asked why data was concealed on a test of the SS-25, denied the charge but added that both sides "have no strict obligations to act in accordance" with SALT II since it was never ratified.

The Soviet official tried to obtain details of U.S. monitoring capabilities by requesting that U.S. officials provide parameters of what information could not be picked up. The United States turned down the Soviet request since it would have allowed the Soviets to know the limits of U.S. electronic collectors and thus compromise the system's effectiveness, the report states.

Besides compliance-verification data telemetry intercepts from satellite reconnaissance can be used to determine a missile's potential threat and to formulate defensive measures.

Analysts believe U.S. technical intelligence collectors systems have already been compromised by Soviet telemetry encryption since the systems were designed specifically to verify compliance with arms control agreements.

Angelo Codevilla, an intelligence expert with Stanford University's Hoover Institution, said that during the era of detente the United States decided to invest billions of tax dollars in technical spy systems primarily intended for arms control verification.

"Nearly all of the technical systems were built to monitor the world conceived by Robert McNamara in the late '60s and [by] Henry Kissinger in the early '70s," Mr. Codevilla said in an interview. "That is to say, a world of stability and increasing cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union . . . a largely predictable, peaceful world where space would be a sanctuary from which, by agreement and custom, intelligence systems would be allowed to operate."

Consequently, the U.S. intelligence community was divided among Pentagon planners who prefered conflict-oriented defense intelligence systems and technologists who wanted systems designed to verify arms agreements.

"So the question was to what extent do we take these billions away from the systems conceived according to this world, and devote them to systems built according to a very different perception of the world, systems that would not necessarily give you terribly fine pictures of silos, but systems that would allow you to target forces and increase command and control centers," Mr. Codevilla said.

The problem is that the U.S. systems were built without serious concern for Soviet capabilities to manipulate or frustrate them, Mr. Codevilla said. Technical systems were designed to monitor signal-to-noise ratios, electronic sensitivity, to collect high numbers of channels and for multiplex signal monitoring.

"These are important technical issues, but they never addressed the issue: the Soviets are going to find out something about your system, something about its existence, and given that knowledge, what are they going to do with it?" Mr. Codevilla asked. "How can you check on the extent to which they are using that channel to pass information to you and how do they modify their exposure to your system?"

Relying on intelligence collection to verify arms control agreements will present greater problems in the future as Soviet weapons systems, currently stationary and easily detectable by overhead satellites, become more mobile, Mr. Codevilla said.

"Most forces . . . in the Soviet Union, including missile forces, are terribly mobile," he added.

A CIA estimate released in June shows that by the mid-1990s, mobile land-based ICBMs will account for more than 12 percent of the total Soviet strategic arsenal.

Without adequate counterintelligence on technical systems, the United States will continue to be vulnerable to Soviet concealment practices such as telemetry encryption, Mr. Codevilla said.

SAKHAROV'S STEPSON ENDS HUNGER STRIKE UPON ASSURANCES FROM STATE DEPARTMENT

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, earlier today Alexei Semyonov, stepson of Nobel Laureate Andrei Sakharov, who along with his wife Dr. Yelena Bonner has been missing from their apartment in Gorky for quite some time, ended his 14-day hunger strike on their behalf. Having survived these past 2 weeks on only water, with no shelter from the elements in his makeshift living space near the Soviet Embassy here, Alexei Semyonov held a press conference today at which he reiterated his desire to learn of his parents' health and whereabouts. However, he stated that he was ending his hunger strike because he had received assurances from officials in the State Department that a high priority would be given to his parents' case by the administration before and during the Geneva summit meeting in November between President Reagan and Soviet Communist Party leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

His meeting with officials at the State Department is to take place this afternoon; I expect that the support Alexei has received from various Members of Congress over the past weeks has assisted in this effort. He still desires, however, to meet with President Reagan in order to personally convey his feelings about the direction in which his parents' situation should be approached.

Yesterday, Congressman FRANK (Mass.) and I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 186, a resolution requesting the President to make known to the Soviet Government the feelings of all of us on this matter. Expressing our deep concern and moral outrage at the lack of communications between Alexei, his sister Tanya Yankelevich and their parents, all signatory nations to the Helsinki Final Act are urged to express to Soviet authorities their desire for a reopening of familial contact.

I was pleased to learn that this resolution will be similarly introduced by Senator D'AMATO (NY) in the Senate today, with swift consideration anticipated by that body.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to insert for my colleagues' review the text of Alexei Semyonov's remarks during today's press conference, as well as a recent Washington Post column by Mary McGrory about his courageous and dedicated efforts on behalf of his parents.

STATEMENT OF ALEXEI SEMYONOV

Today I am breaking my hunger strike which I started fourteen days ago. Yesterday, I was contacted by the State Department. I was informed that they are making it a high priority issue for the U.S. Embassy in Moscow to find the whereabouts of my parents and to reestablish communication with them. I was assured that the State Department will use every opportunity to resolve the case of my parents before the November summit. At this time, I think the continuation of my fast will not serve the purpose of helping my parents. Indeed, it could perhaps hamper the efforts of the State Department. My demands at the outset of my hunger strike were not satisfied. Thus, this is not the end of the struggle. My parents remain completely isolated and their fate is uncertain, governed by the whims of the KGB. We must continue all efforts to save them.

I am convinced that the United States should press the Soviet Government to release the Sakharovs before the November summit. Right now, the Soviet Government is involved in an extensive media campaign to blame the possible failure of the summit on the U.S. No one will be fooled by their rhetoric.

If the Soviet Union is indeed interested in constructive talks, in creating an atmosphere of good will at the summit, they should make improvements in the human rights area which are of grave and immediate concern to the West. Human Rights policy is the one true indicator of the Soviet's intentions; if they are not willing to make a humanitarian gesture of releasing my parents, living symbols of the struggle for human rights in the Soviet Union, then they are not interested in results at the Geneva talks; it will in fact be useless to accommodate them.

I still seek a meeting with President Reagan. I do not doubt his sincere commitment to human rights and to my parents. As the President himself stated on the occasion of my stepfather's sixty-fourth birthday, "Let all who cherish Dr. Sakharov's noble values, both governments and individuals, continue to press the Soviets for information about the Sakharovs and for an end to Soviet persecution of two of its most distinguished citizens." By meeting me, the President would come to understand the seemingly endless anguish of our family; it will also clearly show the lasting U.S. concerns for human rights.

In the continuing struggle for my parents I am grateful that I can count on the support of the United States Congress. I hope that Members of Congress will encourage the administration to vigorously pursue the resolution of the Sakharovs case.

My stepfather, Dr. Sakharov, has always enjoyed widespread support of the world scientific community. I hope that his colleagues will come to the aid of my parents in this tragic hour. The statement released by the National Academy of Science two days ago demonstrates the academy's understanding of the urgency of this situation. I count on their continuing efforts to win the release of my parents.

My parents are in mortal danger. The time to save them is now, before the November summit. Thank you for coming.

GORBACHEV'S OPPORTUNITY

Communist leader Mikhail Gorbachev is getting a fantastic pre-summit press. His interview with Time magazine, his long seance with six U.S. senators have created a picture of astuteness, flair and mastery that has the White House wailing for equal time.

His greatest opportunity for a public-relations triumph, however, is sitting in a beach chair on a Washington street corner. Alexsey Semyonov, the 29-year-old stepson of Andrei Sakharov, is in the second full week of a hunger strike undertaken to force the Soviet government into producing his parents, whom he last saw on a Soviet videotape in July. The stream of postcards from Gorki, the town to which Sakharov and his wife, Yelena Bonner, were exiled in 1980, abruptly ceased in April.

Semyonov decided on his hunger strike on Aug. 18, the birthday of his grandmother. She lives with him in Newton, Mass., and for the first time in his life, no cable came from his parents.

"It's impossible to imagine that somehow they could have forgotten. It never happened in the 29 years I have lived. My grandmother's birthday is the main event in the family."

Semyonov sent a cable to the Soviet Embassy threatening a fast if he could not see his parents. He flew here on Aug. 30 and settled in on the corner that is more than the requisite 500 yards from the embassy. He has been living on Perrier and cigarettes ever since and has lost 21 pounds.

The worst time of the day is when he crosses the street to use a hotel's facilities and has to pass a chocolate store.

He is a tall, mild, wan young mathematician. He says in his accented English, "I don't know if it will work, but I have to do something."

He has a homemade sign beside him: "I am on hunger-strike. Soviets, let me see my parents. Free Sakharovs." He is at his post every day from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. He took time out yesterday to escort his grandmother to the White House to see Patrick J. Buchanan.

There has been no word from the Soviets, but the response from passers-by has been gratifying. "I was only there 15 minutes when a woman came with mineral water. Another secretary who works near here typed up a petition to the Soviet Embassy. We have hundreds of signatures."

Notables visit: Jason Robards, who played Sakharov in a television film; a deputation of congressmen.

"When I came to Washington before," he observes quizzically, "I used to have to make appointments with people. Now they make appointments with me."

Semyonov thinks it is a "disgrace and a scandal for all the U.S. press" that Time has a two-hour interview with Gorbachev and never raised the question of human rights.

"The media says Gorbachev is a pragmatic, energetic leader, but if he is pragmatic he should try to do something positive by changing at least something of the human rights record in the Soviet Union. It would cost the Soviet Union nothing and would show a desire to negotiate genuinely with the West.

"I agree completely with my stepfather's thinking that the system which disregards human rights and does not allow citizens to discuss problems of the country is a danger of starting a war. It is so when the question of war and peace is decided by a small group of bureaucracy."

Semyonov subscribes to the Reagan theory of the Soviet Union as the "evil empire"—and "if it continues for another 100 years with complete totalitarianism, it will spread."

The resolution of the Sakharov problem ties the Soviets in knots. Semyonov, who emigrated after the authorities warned they would draft him, explains that to the Kremlin, his stepfather is not just a dissident but a traitor to the establishment. Three times proclaimed a hero of the Soviet state, he was a scientist who became politicized by tests of the hydrogen bomb he created.

The Soviets know that their persecution of the saintly scientist costs them in world opinion, but they growl that Sakharov gave away state secrets, that to liberate him would be to bow to President Reagan. Sakharov is to them an agitator who misrepresents the contented Soviet people as yearning for freedom.

"It is racist and fascist to say that the Russians do not want liberty," says Semyonov. "It is in the Russian soul as in every human soul."

Gorbachev, who has demonstrated shrewdness and understanding of Western politics in the interviews, could really knock over the superpower Chessboard if he let the Sakharovs go—or at lesat permitted them to be seen by someone other than official Soviet cameramen.

A CONSERVATIVE CASE FOR SANCTIONS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the case for economic sanctions toward South Africa cannot be more thoughtfully stated than by our colleague Representative VIN WEBER, whose intellectual honesty is most apparent in the attached article I submit for the RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. WEBER's piece in USA Today be inserted in the RECORD.

A CONSERVATIVE CASE FOR SANCTIONS

(By Vin Weber)

NEW ULM, MINN.—Conservatives have a responsibility to consistently support freedom, pluralism, and representative government around the world.

We have been able to take the moral high ground in opposing communist governments because their ideology attacks these values.

It is time to realize that supporting the South African government, where freedom, pluralism, and representative government are not recognized, undermines our moral opposition to communism.

Conservatives have supported the South African government because of its anti-communist stance. We have looked at South Africa strictly in East-West terms.

But in an attempt to oppose communism, we have supported a system that is polarizing South Africa, making it more difficult to achieve peace.

Freedom in South Africa does not mean violent revolution and a new totalitarianism. Support for economic pressure on the government of South Africa does not mean support for communist-aided insurgents who wish to destabilize Southern Africa.

The racial discrimination of apartheid denies freedom. Real reform means an end to forced separation of black families, an end to the ban on black property ownership, and basic civil liberties for all.

To the extent that we can effect any change in South Africa, sanctions are one part of a policy of increased pressure. They are more public and demonstrative than "constructive engagement," less damaging to the black economy than a total ban on trade, and substantial enough to exert some economic pressure on Pretoria.

We should not expect the immediate establishment of a Western-style democracy. South Africa is a nation of many minorities, and the rights of all its peoples must be protected.

As conservatives, we have argued we have a moral obligation to support the refuseniks in the Soviet Union, the refugees in Cambodia, the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. Our goal of freedom in South Africa is the same as our goal around the world.

Our foreign policy success depends upon extending freedom, pluralism, and representative government. It's time to turn our eyes to South Africa.

A TRIBUTE TO ROBERT VOIT

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding member of my community, Robert Voit. I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring this tremendous individual. This year on October 4, 1985, the Boys and Girls Club of San Fernando Valley will present its 1985 Founders Award to Robert D. Voit, president, the Voit Co.

A graduate of the University of California at Berkeley, Robert Voit formed the Voit Co. in 1971. The initial project of this fledgling company was a modest two-building, two-story office complex in Woodland Hills. Since that time he has worked hard to see this venture grow into the highly successful property development and management business that it is today. Mr. Voit has been responsible for the development or renovation of more than 2 million square-feet of commercial and industrial properties.

Along with his successful business endeavors he has found the time do donate his abilities to important community organizations. He currently serves as first vice chairman of the San Fernando Valley Cultural Foundation and he is also on the board of the Valley Cultural Center. In addition, he has served on the board of the Pacific Boys Lodge.

It is my pleasure and honor to join with my colleagues and the Boys and Girls Club of San Fernando Valley to pay tribute to Robert Voit, a successful businessman and outstanding member of his community.

TAX REFORM HARMFUL TO HISTORICAL BUILDINGS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I received an excellent letter from one of my constituents, Mrs. Loretta M. Wyatt of Mayfield, KY, which I would like to share with my colleagues. Mrs. Wyatt has written to me about her opposition to the President's tax reform proposal as it relates to tax credits that are presently allowed for the renovation and restoration of old buildings in designated historical areas.

Loretta Wyatt mentions Hall Hotel in my hometown of Mayfield, KY, as a case in point. After its renovation, this hotel will be taxed at many times its present valuation. Loretta Wyatt also understands the long-term disadvantages of repealing these tax incentives.

Her letter follows:

MAYFIELD, KY,
July 10, 1985.

Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. HUBBARD: One of the proposals which I understand is currently before the House Ways and Means Committee would do away with the tax credit which now makes it feasible to renovate and restore old buildings in designated historical areas. The proposed renovation of the Hall Hotel in Mayfield, KY, is a case in point. When it is completed it will go back on the tax books at many, many times its present valuation.

The same thing is a possibility for many of the currently deteriorating buildings in downtown Mayfield—as well as in thousands of other towns and cities, not only in our area but all over the country.

Instead of letting these buildings stand as empty eyesores until they eventually deteriorate to the point that they are condemned, the continuing tax incentive can help to restore great areas that otherwise would be abandoned. At the same time such restorations will put great sums of money back into their communities in the vast amounts of money used for materials and labor in the restorations.

If the recommendation to remove this tax credit comes out of the Ways and Means Committee, I hope you will see fit to use your influence as a member of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee to restore it.

We have too many basically fine old buildings in the United States that we can't afford to have destroyed.

Yours very truly,

Mrs. LORETTA M. WYATT.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 320

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to voice my support for House Joint Resolution 320 designating November 24 through November 30 as "National Adoption Week."

Along with the 83 of my colleagues who are cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 320 I realize that the adoption of a child is a gift for which families are eternally thankful. With this in mind, Thanksgiving seems to be a particularly appropriate time to recognize all those involved in the adoption process—the child, the family, and the facilitating organization.

More than 2 million couples in this country are awaiting the joy of an adopted child. Most will wait an agonizing 5 to 7 years for a healthy, newborn infant. In addition, thousands of minority and "special needs" children are still waiting to be placed in permanent homes. It is a tragedy that so many of these children will be institutionalized or placed in orphanages this year.

Although Congress passed the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, which secured permanent homes for many "special needs" children, much still remains to be done. I am urging all of my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this resolution as an excellent way to raise public awareness and highlight the unique problems of adoption. It could be the first step toward reducing the number of unwanted and unadopted children.

THE GROWING NEED FOR HUNGER RELIEF IN THE UNITED STATES

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, over the last two decades, we have developed a network of programs designed to improve the availability of a nutritious diet for people with low incomes. I would be remiss in stating that we have not realized any success in meeting the intent of these programs. However, as chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, it is my belief that the time has come for us to take a long hard look at current policy and determine how responsive these programs are today. In recent years, the prevalence of hunger in the United States has been documented in numerous reports; yet, to date, the Federal Government has not enacted program modifications which address the seriousness of the hunger problem. We have fallen short in our responsibility to maintain a strong line of defense against hunger.

I would like to share an article, authored by Representative LEON PANETTA, which appeared in "the New York Times" in September 9. Congressman PANETTA, who is chairman of both the House Agriculture Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations and Nutrition and the Select Committee's Task Force on Domestic Hunger, clearly presents the magnitude of the hunger in America and offers us a viable means for alleviating this problem. I feel it imperative that we heed his message.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 9, 1985]

HUNGER IS GROWING, BUT RELIEF ISN'T

(By Leon E. Panetta)

WASHINGTON.—The key to the budget debate is knowing where to cut and where to invest in the battle for future savings. One fundamental lesson I've learned is that cutbacks in certain programs, such as those that feed the hungry, save no money at all. Hunger is so fundamental a problem, and has such a far-reaching effect on health and spirit, that even small investments today to combat it are likely to produce substantial long-term savings.

Alarm bells warning of increasing hunger are sounding, but few people seem to be listening. What was discounted a few years ago as shallow and anecdotal evidence about the growth of hunger and poverty is now turning up as cold, hard statistics. The situation is critical, especially for our children.

Recent Public Health Service studies indicate not only that the steady decline since 1965 in the infant mortality rate has virtually halted but that the mortality rate for infants from 1 to 12 months old appears to be increasing. It is in this period that nutritional and health measures play a large role in preventing death.

The Childern's Defense Fund reports that the black infant death rate increased in 1983, for the first time in more than a decade. Compared to white children, black children are twice as likely to die in the first year of life, be born prematurely or suffer low birth weight.

The latest available poverty statistics indicate that nearly one-fourth of all American children under 6 live in poverty—a four-year increase of 45 percent. More than 50 percent of black children under 6 and more than 40 percent of such Hispanic children live in poverty.

Physicians around the nation are reporting an increase in nutrition-related health problems in children, including instances of diseases usually found in third world countries.

Over the past 28 months, I have been involved in 16 hearings on the hunger issue in Washington and around America, visited dozens of soup kitchens and talked with many people involved with the problem. Their message has been so uniform that I have no doubt that it is true: The hunger problem is real and growing. It is a message confirmed by countless studies and surveys.

With all the talk about hunger, in recent years the Federal response has been inadequate.

Private-sector charities and food banks have responded generously to the crisis, but their efforts are falling short. Congress has staved off nutrition cutbacks sought by the Administration in addition to those enacted in 1981 and 1982, but has been largely unsuccessful in restoring funding to vital nutrition programs that serve our poorest citizens. Even President Reagan's conservative Task Force on Food Assistance recommended spending increases that have yet to be enacted.

The House took a positive step by passing the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. Despite the strongly bipartisan 364-39 vote, the Senate took no action and the bill died.

This year, a similar bill pending in the House Agriculture Committee faces an uphill battle for enactment. While not ending hunger, it would make a difference. Restoring some 1981 and 1982 cutbacks, it would mean a few more days a month that millions would not have to go without food or rely on soup kitchens, or a few more days a month that many children might concentrate better in school, or a few more days a month that parents could feed their families and still have utilities function in their homes.

Public and media attention to hunger hit its peak some time ago. If we do not heed the alarm bells now, we will lock in even greater social problems and dollar costs down the road. For our children, further delays could result in irreversible damage to their development.

There should be no place for the shame of hunger in this country.

H.R. 7, THE SCHOOL LUNCH AND CHILD NUTRITION ACT OF 1985, IS CRITICALLY NEEDED

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 7, the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Act of 1985, a measure that is critical to both the immediate well-being of America's children and the long-term health of our Nation.

The five child nutrition programs which will be extended through H.R. 7 have been very successful in improving the nutrition of pregnant women and children and are essential components in our national effort to combat hunger. Crucial to the continued success of these programs is the $121 million increase in funding, approved by the congressional budget resolution. This additional funding is vital if the WIC, School Lunch and Child Nutrition Programs are to remain cost effective and successful.

Mr. Speaker, like all of us here today, I am deeply concerned about our enormous and threatening national deficit. However, a real halt in deficit spending can only come about through legislation and spending that is geared toward long-term growth and efficiency. If we deny this modest sum requested, I fear this Nation will pay in the long run; in dollars, in productivity, and in the quality of life for many of our citizens.

The need for funding for WIC and child nutrition programs is tragically clear. In contrast to the administration's optimistic statistics, I contend that hunger is still a very real and devastating threat in my own State of South Carolina and in our Nation. The number of poor children in the United States is growing: there are one-third more poor children today than there were in the late 1970's.

The statistics on infant mortality and birth weight are equally distressing. The United States currently ranks 12th among developed nations in infant mortality, a sensitive indicator of a nation's overall health. In 1982, infant mortality claimed 42,401 victims in the United States, more than breast cancer, leukemia, or diabetes. In addition, in 1982, nearly a quarter of a million babies in the United States were born too small to have the best chance of a healthy survival. Such statistics clearly demonstrate the need for the WIC, school lunch and child nutrition programs, and the importance of congressional support for H.R. 7.

Numerous studies have shown that the WIC Program has been cost-effective. By administering to the immediate nutritional needs of low-income women and children through WIC, the Government is saved from providing long-term food, medical, and educational assistance. For every $1 spent in the WIC Program, $3 is saved in terms of later expenditures for care and treatment health costs.

The school lunch and breakfast programs have also proven to be cost-effective. H.R. 7 maintains the quality of the school lunch program for 3 million low-income children. Poor nutrition in school-age children can lead to poor physical growth, anemia, and poor behavior development, which can, in turn, stunt academic growth and performance.

As a Nation, we pride ourselves on our commitment to human development and economic growth. However, if we fail to provide adequate support and nourishment for America's children, we will forgo opportunities for new successes and continued development. In short, the potential for economic and social development exists. Whether this potential is realized depends, to a great extent, on our ability to focus our leadership, resources, and energy on solving the tragic problem of hunger and malnutrition.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall 300 today, I was unavoidably absent while addressing the Labor Policy Association and the Employee Relations Committee of the Business Roundtable, on the subject of "Plant Closings" and H.R. 1616. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."

FATHER GHEORGHE CALCIU

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, earlier today I had the privilege of joining Father Gheorghe Calciu at a press conference and later at a luncheon. I take this time this afternoon to welcome to America a true spiritual giant, a courageous defender of human rights, a man of God.

Released on August 4 by Romanian officials, Father Gheorghe Calciu has spent a total of 21 years in Romanian prisons on phony charges. He has endured beatings, deprivation of food and water, solitary confinement, painful separation from his wife Adrianne and son Andre and other forms of torture because of his unswerving commitment to Christ, the Gospel, and the highest moral principles.

Mr. Speaker, while we are all grateful to the Romanian authorities for releasing Father Calciu, his freedom should not be permitted to cloak or conceal the ongoing repression directed against believers in Romania. There are numerous reliable reports of new arrests and convictions of Christians, demolition of orthodox churches, police harassment of believers and other acts of religious persecution.

This past June, Congressmen FRANK WOLF, TONY HALL, and I visited Romania and met with key Government leaders including Stefan Andrei, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Ion Cumpanasu, Minister of Cults, various religious leaders and many others. We came away deeply impressed with the religious fervor of the people, deeply saddened with the harshness of the Government's policies.

Clearly, Father Calciu's emigration to the United States is a source of encouragement. He brings with him a saga of bravery and persistence that inspires. A story that must be told to the American people. He brings with him, the truth about Romania. We do well to listen.

At this point in the RECORD, I insert a brief statement from this morning's press conference by Father Calciu:

REMARKS OF FATHER GHEORGHE CALCIU

Dear friends, a conjunction of events, vastly different in themselves, has at this moment focused interest on me. On one side there is the inhumane communist government of Romania and on the other, the generous Christian action put in motion by people of good will.

But I am only a simple priest, formerly a professor at the Theological Institute of Bucharest. In the sermons given in the church where I was serving God, I did nothing more than protest against the undermining of religion and all human rights as practiced by the totalitarian regime which attacks directly the Christian faith and plots against a nation which has already suffered a lot because of her faith in God.

Of myself I am nothing, God but made me to stay the flow of evil in certain circles. In the Lord's vineyard I am only like that servant in the Gospel of Saint Luke, who was faithful to his Master and to whom the Master did not say: "Come at once and sit down at the table", but, rather said to him "Prepare supper for me first, till I eat and drink, and afterwards you shall eat and drink." (Luke 17:8). For, indeed, we the priests shall say "We are unprofitable servants, we have done that which was our duty to do." (vs.10)

Through all that you did for me, giving up your rightful comforts and peace, you obeyed a divine urge coming from the very depth of yourselves, for God is deeper in us than we ourselves are, or in the words of Saint Augustine "interior me ipsum."

Thank you! You are a great and generous nation which has grasped the role the Divine Providence has entrusted you to play in the modern world. Your generosity makes me realize that you have recognized the political mistakes and taken measures to redress them. I am but one small voice issuing from the hearts of thousands which you saved from suffering and the power of the abominable fear in which they lived. Should they all be joined together, they would form a great chorus that should pierce the heart of the world.

I have no idea how to address myself to American hearts. My language is the language of suffering, and I am convinced that you can understand it.

Immigration is an individual solution but not the final answer for oppressed populations. By what you have done you have proven your great personal capacity for sacrifice and generosity. But you must act still more courageously and generously by awakening the conscience of those around you. "Shout from the roof tops" what up to now you have spoken quietly. Your voice in defense of the oppressed makes their suffering smaller. They feel they are not abandoned, somebody is concerned, somebody cares.

You will surprise many by your attitude and they will ask, "By what authority are you doing these things . . ." (Matt. 11:28). You can really do wonders because your voice is the voice of Jesus who calls mankind to freedom and dignity.

We all have one heart and in it we carry Christ, the cornerstone of our redemption and the flag of our victory over evil. I humbly offer you my heart and my love. I have no power and I can boast of no creative genius for by myself I have done nothing. It is you who have given me freedom for no other reason than to do good, and my gratitude is deep.

Nevertheless, it is hard for us to eat our daily bread in peace and rejoice in the quietude of our home as long as millions of oppressed peoples who trust you and believe in your power and generosity continue to suffer, calling for help.

Before your eyes the gates towards Christian endeavor stand wide open. You must sow these fertile fields even if the harvest may appear distant, sow for "One soweth and another reaps." (John 4:37).

May God Bless You All!

A BILL DEALING WITH TAX-EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS INVESTMENT IN REAL ESTATE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a bill to help section 501(c)(3) tax-exempt organizations, pension funds, and Government retirement plans diversify their investment portfolios by enhancing their ability to invest in real estate. This bill will be particularly helpful to private foundations, charities and colleges and universities with relatively small endowments, and it will result in no revenue loss to the Treasury.

Currently, small foundations, charities, and educational institutions are denied opportunities available to larger tax-exempt organizations because they cannot pool their investments with pension funds. An investment in real estate available to a larger university, for example, is foreclosed to smaller entities that do not want to commit all or a large percentage of their endowments to a single investment. Consequently, these smaller organizations are unable to obtain the sound investment mix permitted by diversification.

Foundations, private colleges and universities, and other institutions are currently facing severe financial pressure. Federal budget cuts have diminshed tax incentives for certain contributions, reducing funds available for charities. We need to act to help these groups survive, especially the smaller ones. Facilitating investment diversification is one means of assistance.

Diversification of investment is essential to protect the corpus of tax-exempt organizations. For example, a prudent university or a foundation may prefer to own 10 percent of 10 buildings than to own 100 percent of 1 building. Because of current prohibitions on pooling investment funds with other tax-exempt organizations, smaller tax-exempt institutions are unable to obtain the diversification available to larger institutions and thus must limit their investment alternatives to bonds and securities. Reliance on these investment options alone caused many small tax-exempt institutions to suffer significant losses in the 1970's.

This bill, creating a new section 501(c)(24), erases that inequity. This new provision authorizes the establishment of a corporation or trust in which charities and pension funds may share ownership. The corporation or trust will be organized for the purpose of investing funds of tax-exempt entities in real estate. The tax-exempt shareholders or beneficiaries will retain control over the investment of their funds because the bill limits the total number of investors to 35 and requires that the investment manager be removed if a majority in interest so votes.

In addition, this bill provides that section 501(c)(24) organizations will be eligible for the acquisition indebtedness rules enacted in 1980 for pension plans, thus removing another inconsistency with respect to investment by tax-exempt organizations.

With Government funding of private foundations and other tax institutions decreasing, it is important to remove unfair and unreasonable restrictions on the investment opportunities of these organizations. This bill will facilitate such investments with no revenue loss to the Treasury as a result.

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CONCEPTION OF THE U.S. ANTARCTIC PROGRAM

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 30th anniversary of the first day of planning for the 1957–58 "International Geophysical Year" [IGY] which initiated the U.S. Antarctic Program. Even by today's standards, I believe it is accurate to say that the IGY and the activities it spawned has been the most successful cooperative effort in the history of nations.

In 1983 I was privileged to head a congressional delegation to Antarctica to visit the research stations at McMurdo and South Pole. The group interviewed a number of the scientists from U.S. universities who were conducting research projects at those two stations. In addition, we inspected the logistic support provided by the U.S. Navy, the U.S. Coast Guard and the civilian contractor, Antarctic Services, Inc.

This brief exposure to the challenging and exciting frontiers of science being pursued on the hostile continent of Antarctica by dedicated men of many nations gave me a very deep appreciation for what has been done, and for what lies ahead. I salute all the scientists, technicians, and explorers who have challenged the elements to work to unlock the secrets contained in that frozen wonderland.

The continent known as Antarctica is a complex issue for the nations of the world. It comprises approximately 10 percent of the world's land area, even though most of it is covered with ice up to 2 miles thick. Sovereignty over the continent is an unresolved issue. Seven nations have claimed parts of the continent but, these claims are weak and are unrecognized by most nations. The territorial claims of three of the nations overlap substantially. Prior to the enactment of the Antarctic Treaty this was a source of some friction among the claimants and, in the event the Antarctic Treaty should ever become ineffective, it could lead to future international discord.

The Antarctic Treaty was initially proposed by the United States and it has been longstanding U.S. policy to lend strong support to making the treaty effective. It has also been longstanding U.S. policy that the U.S. presence in Antarctica shall be influential and solidly based on a balanced program of scientific research. For this reason, the conduct of the U.S. Antarctic Program has been assigned to the National Science Foundation to be operated under the general guidance of relevant Presidential directives, the most recent of which was issued by the President on February 5, 1982. Overall administration development of policy with respect to Antarctic issues is assisted by the multiagency Antarctic Policy Group [APG] chaired by the Department of State.

The treaty, proposed by the United States in 1958 entered into force in 1961. The treaty accomplishes three significant things:

First, defuses tension over the claims issue during the life of the treaty;

Second, effectively demilitarizes the continent; and

Third, provides for free and open access to all parts of the continent for peaceful purposes.

The resources of the continent are largely a matter of speculation at the present time. Some exploitation of marine living resources, primarily whales and seals, has gone on for the past century. Overexploitation eventually led to conservation measures such as the International Whaling Convention [IWC] and the Convention for the Conservation of Antarctic Seals.

More recently, exploratory fishing for Antarctic fin fish and for a tiny crustacean, Euphousia Superba—commonly know as krill—which is a basic food source for fish, seals, whales and penguins—has begun by several nations. In recognition, the nations party to the Antarctic Treaty, concluded in 1981 a Convention for the Conservation of Antarctic Marine Living Resources. In preparation for the time in the distant future when Antarctic mineral resources might become known and economical to exploit, these nations are actively negotiating another agreement to provide for rational decisionmaking and control of such exploitation.

In the long run, however, the primary benefit to be derived by mankind from the continent is apt to be the results of years of painstaking scientific research that, bit-by-bit, pieces together a mosaic of understanding of the role of the polar regions in governing the environment or climate of the world. The major areas of research significant to understanding of the attributes of Antarctica include oceanography, geology, geophysics, marine biology, glaciology, and the atmospheric sciences.

In their influence upon the oceans, the weather, and the world's climate, both polar regions are important. The differences in the geographical configurations of the two regions are such that the Antarctic probably has the more significant impact.

One of the most important milestones outside the establishment of the original station at McMurdo was the dedication of the new Amundsen-Scott South Pole Station on January 9, 1975.

Congressman J.J. (JAKE) PICKLE represented us at that dedication 10 years ago and made the dedicatory remarks at the new research station honoring the first two explorers to reach the geographic South Pole—the Amundsen-Scott South Pole Station. He was a member of our Science and Technology Committee at that time.

This ceremony reinforced the commitment of the United States to carry out research and development by our country and other countries in that vast Antarctic continent. It is vitally important that we do so. For these past 30 years, I believe the United States has kept that pledge and has worked cooperatively with the other nations involved.

TRIBUTE TO RUTH BURGESS YATES

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to pay tribute to a longtime friend of mine, Mrs. Ruth Burgess Yates, who died May 18, 1985, at Western Baptist Hospital in Paducah, KY.

Mrs. Yates, age 53, was the wife of Rev. Harry C. Yates, who, for the past 26 years, has been pastor of Farmington Baptist Church at Farmington, KY.

It has been my privilege to serve as State senator (1967–75) and Congressman (since January 1975) for Ruth and Harry Yates, two friends whom I have admired ever since I met them in 1963.

Ruth Yates was a talented, personable, and very attractive lady who loved her family, community, church, country and, yes, life itself. Maybe because my own parents were a Baptist minister and the wife of a Baptist preacher do I notice, more than some others, a husband-and-wife team who lead a church congregation in a specially effective manner. I repeat my admiration for Ruth and Harry Yates.

The life of Ruth Yates will not be remembered for financial or political or history-making accomplishments. However, her dedication to Christianity and her Creator, her influence on the many lives with whom she did come in contact, and her contributions as a citizen, wife, mother, and grandmother will certainly be remembered by all those who knew her.

Ruth Burgess Yates' two children are Alan Yates of Paducah, KY, and Diane Yates of Farmington. Mrs. Yates is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Paul Price of Mayfield, KY, and Mrs. Aylene Stoner of O'Fallon, IL; two brothers, J.T. Burgess and Bob Burgess, both of Collinsville, IL; and two grandchildren, Alana Yates and Colette Yates, both of Paducah.

I extend to Rev. Harry C. Yates and other family members my sympathy upon the untimely death, caused by cancer, of a beloved Kentuckian—Ruth Burgess Yates.

PERIKLIS HALKIAS, 1985 NATIONAL HERITAGE FELLOWSHIP

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues in the Congress, that a constituent of mine, Periklis Halkias, a Greek clarinetist, is one of 12 master traditional artists chosen by the National Endowment of the Arts as a 1985 National Heritage fellowship winner. All the winners were nominated for national honors by the general public and judged by the advisory panel of the Folk Arts Program and the National Council on the Arts.

Mr. Halikias, who lives in Astoria, is recognized as one of the finest musicians of the Oriental style of clarinet playing. Letters of nomination regarding Mr. Halkias referred to his "extraordinary instrumental technique," and called him "a living archive of Greek music."

Mr. Halkias was born in the Epirot region of northern Greece and started playing the clarinet at the age of 10. In pre-World War II Greece, he regularly played in folk music clubs. Mr. Halkias came to the United States in 1964, and was soon established as a familiar figure in the Greek nightclubs in Manhattan and of course, is often seen in Queens. Mr. Halkias has passed along his love for music to his sons, who are both accomplished folk musicians.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues join me and the people of Queens in congratulating Mr. Halkias. Periklis Halkias is an extraordinary man who is not only to be commended for his exceptional musical talent and skill, but for his commitment to his heritage and his community.

A TRIBUTE TO NICK T. POTTS

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to salute Nick Potts for the 45 years of dedicated and distinguished service he has given to his country. On August 30, Mr. Potts, who hails from Louisville, closes out a most remarkable career in jet engine repair, 43 years of which were undertaken at Patuxent Naval Air Test Center in Maryland's First Congressional District.

In 1940, at the age of 17, Nick joined the Navy and became a flight engineer aboard PBY's and PBM's, flying wartime missions in the both the Atlantic and Pacific. These were challenging times, as Nick and the members of his squadron ushered in the epoch of jet propulsion and radar tracking.

If Nick's responsibilities in wartime were rigorous, his duties in peacetime were immense. For Nick assumed the heavy burden of making sure that newly designed jet aircraft functioned properly.

In 1968, Nick concluded his military career and became the first civilian maintenance officer in the Navy, first at Weapons Systems Test Division, then at South Site Maintenance and most recently at ASW. Upon retirement last month, Mr. Potts was assistant maintenance branch head at the antisubmarine aircraft test directorate.

For his many accomplishments, the Naval Air Station's Commanding Officer designated August 30 as "Potts River Day." Nick shares this well-deserved honor with his wife Florence Marie Zawislak Potts and their six children: Barbara Jo Davis, Nicholas Thomas Potts, Jr., Lynn Marie Kelly, Janet Lee Olson, Judy Ann Potts, and Robert Edward Potts as well as their nine grandchildren: Michael, Nicholas, Steven, Neely Marie, Kevin Lee, MacKenzie Marie, Jennifer Lynn, John Glenn, and Melissa Ann.

I extend my congratulations to Nick Potts on this occasion and wish him well in his future endeavors. His exemplary service to his country will long be remembered by his fellow military and civilian colleagues at Pax River and is greatly appreciated by his fellow Americans.

SEMENOV'S HUNGER STRIKE FOR THE SAKHAROVS

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that I have read and heard the accounts of Alexey Semenov, now in his 14th day of a hunger strike to protest the isolation of his mother, Dr. Yelena Bonner and step-father, Dr. Andrei Sakharov. For over 2 months, Alexey has received no communications from his parents. For over 5 years, his parents have been held in exile in the closed city of Gorky, and for the past 6 months, Drs. Sakharov and Bonner have received no communications either by mail or telephone. It is not known whether they are in good health, or even alive.

Faced with this desparate situation, Semenov has resorted to undertaking a hunger strike across the street from the Soviet Embassy here in Washington. His only plea is to see his parents either in the West or in the Soviet Union.

I join Alexey Semenov in his plea. Ten years after the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, it is appalling that the Sakharovs are still denied the most vital of their human rights, the right to live in the country of their choice, to receive the medical attention they deem necessary; and the right to join relatives and friends within the country and be reunited with family outside the Soviet Union.

After years of medical problems and inadequate or no medical treatment, Dr. Sakharov, a recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize, should not be allowed to suffer and made to disappear. He and his wife deserve the care of doctors and of their loved ones.

My heart is with Alexey Semenov in his struggle and my strongest hope is that he might be permitted to see his parents and share a meal with his mother and step-father.

WILLIAM BEAUMONT DAY

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to propose a commemorative resolution to designate November 21, 1985 as "William Beaumont Day."

As you may know, Dr. William Beaumont is one of the more important figures in the history of medical research. His landmark work in the field of human physiology vastly increased our store of knowledge on the human body. Dr. Beaumont's contributions to science continue to have great significance to the present day.

Born in Lebanon, CT, William Beaumont served in the U.S. Army as assistant-surgeon to the 6th Infantry, having joined at the commencement of the war of 1812. In 1822, serving as post surgeon of Ft. Mackinac, MI, Dr. Beaumont took on Alexis St. Martin as a patient. Under Beaumont's care, St. Martin survived an accidental bullet wound to the abdomen. However, although the would healed, it never completely closed. Taking advantage of this unusual circumstance, Beaumont studied the digestive system of his patient from 1825 to 1833. It is for this work that Dr. Beaumont is known.

This year marks the bicentennial of William Beaumont's birth. The Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology recently observed the occasion with its "Beaumont Bicentennial Symposium." President Reagan personally congratulated the federation for its efforts. I urge my colleagues to honor the memory of a man who contributed so much to science and humanity be declaring November 21, 1985 "William Beaumont Day."

LOUIS R. VINCENTI, COMMUNITY BENEFACTOR

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, Pasadena, CA, has just lost one of its chief benefactors, Mr. Louis R. Vincenti, who died several days ago in the city he loved and served.

Louis Vincenti was one of those rare and gifted men who have time to achieve success in the private sector while serving with equal success the public welfare.

Much of the credit for the current vigor and beauty of downtown Pasadena belongs to Louis Vincenti. Back in the early 1960's when the naysayers were pronouncing the death knell over the decaying center of the city, Mr. Vincenti refused to stand by. He moved to support the downtown in voice and action. As president of Mutual Savings and Loan, he set an example by constructing the first major building on Colorado Boulevard in more than 15 years. He was the first chairman of the Pasadena Redevelopment Agency, taking the controversial entity through its occasionally troubled youth with skill and determination. With Mr. Vincenti at the helm, the PRA established a tradition of excellence and success that has proved one of the city's greatest stories.

Louis Vincenti also served the Tournament of Roses. He was involved with the educational needs of his city and State. He was a community asset of unquestioned merit. I am saddened by his death but grateful for his legacy of service and success.

EVENING TIMES CELEBRATES 100 YEARS OF PUBLICATION

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, as you well know, we can't always be in all of the places where news is happening. But it is important for all of us to know what is going on in the world that surrounds us.

On January 1, 1898, news began to surface out of Germany that the Iron Chancellor Bismarck was dead. Rhode Islanders, thousands of miles of ocean away, could not be at the Chancellor's side during his collapse. Nevertheless, they were kept well informed of every late-breaking detail regarding the fate of the man who once ruled all of Germany. Their source of information was a 10-page newspaper printed in northeast Rhode Island.

On January 1, 1969, U.S. troops were entrenched in a bloody war in Vietnam. Many Rhode Islanders would have to celebrate the new year without their loved ones, two continents away. But thanks to a local newspaper's front page picture of U.S. soldiers in Vietnam welcoming in 1969 with toasts of warm beer in their bunkers, many Rhode Islanders were afforded the opportunity to feel a bit closer to the ones they missed.

I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues a little birthday praise for a newspaper that brought these, and thousands of other news items, to the doorsteps of Rhode Islanders throughout the years. Its name is the Evening Times of Pawtucket, RI, and it is celebrating its 100th anniversary of publication this year.

On April 30, 1885, George O. Willard began printing a small, 4-page, primitive-by-modern-standards newspaper in northeast Rhode Island. He called it the Evening Times. Its object was to inform its readers of the day's news while generating public attention toward pressing areas of social and economic concern.

One hundred years later, George Willard's little newspaper is still going strong.

With a booming circulation of 27,000, the Evening Times of Pawtucket has survived many of the setbacks and headaches responsible for the collapse of other daily newspapers. It stands today as a pillar of creative ideas in New England, anxious to fill any reader's palate with a full plate of local, national, and international news.

Throughout its 100 years of life, the Evening Times has changed ownership and even its name a few times, switching off between the Evening Times and the Times. What has remained, however, is that same ability to print the type of cutting edge stories that have kept residents of Pawtucket, Central Falls, Cumberland, Lincoln, See-konk, the Attleboro's and most of northeast Rhode Island well-informed for so many years.

Mr. Speaker, throughout my tenure in public office I have been able to spot individuals and organizations that have a true feel for the community around them. The Evening Times is such an organization. It is a professional publication, well-written, well-edited, and well-designed. And, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the best is yet to come.

THE PRESIDENT ON SOUTH AFRICA: TOO LITTLE, TOO LATE

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, finally the President has determined that American foreign policy needs a single voice to speak out against South African apartheid.

Unfortunately, his single voice is not speaking loud enough to ever be heard by the millions of people suffering daily from the brutality of that racist system. He speaks softly and carries no stick at all. Not only has he been slow in supporting the very idea of economic sanctions against South Africa, but the idea he proposes at this late date is entirely inadequate. As a result, I must urge the Members of the Senate not to delay any further their crucial vote of approval on the compromise sanction bill.

The Congress, in an impressive bipartisan effort, has forged a powerful weapon—one that will cut deep into the heart of the South African economy, and its oppressive economic and social system.

But the President has rejected that weapon. Instead, he has chosen to inflict barely a flesh wound. And his Executive order will not allow any further sanctions—even when it becomes clear his plan will not work.

Furthermore, the President wants to wait for permission from the world trade community before he moves to ban krugerrand sales here.

Not only is this unprecedented, it is unnecessary. There is nothing that requires other countries to sanction our sanctions; to grant permission for this country to advance our ideals around the world.

What is clear from this move is that the President, in an effort to avoid a veto override, has chosen to short circuit the efforts of Congress and the will of a broad cross section of this country. He is out of step on this issue. He has lost credibility. After all, only 2 weeks ago, he told us the people of South Africa had overcome the very oppression that anyone can plainly see is really intensifying every day.

Now it seems that the President is accomplishing his one important goal—to speak to the Government of South Africa with one voice. He surely stands alone on this one. I implore the Senate to let him remain alone by voting to approve the compromise sanction bill.

A MARATHON OF HOPE

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, like hundreds of other Americans, Emily Eskra arrived at the Capitol today and was greeted by her Congressman. But unlike most of the citizens who came to see their national government in action, Ms. Eskra arrived on a tandem bicycle after a 450-mile ride and run. Emily Eskra made her marathon journey from Public Square in Cleveland, OH, to Washington in order to educate people about an often misunderstood disease: epilepsy.

More than 2 million Americans, including Ms. Eskra and her almost 2-year-old daughter Abby, suffer from the disease. Often, though, the pain of the seizures caused by the disorder can be a lesser source of discomfort than the frightened reactions the seizures provoke. "People are so afraid of people who have epilepsy," Ms. Eskra said recently, "because having a seizure is not a pretty sight."

Epileptic seizures can be controlled by medication, and most epileptics lead normal lives. Yet doctors estimate that as many as one-third of the epileptics in the country are not receiving treatment because of fear or ignorance.

By dramatically demonstrating that epilepsy need not be a disabling condition, Emily Eskra hopes to make life a little easier for her daughter and the hundreds of thousands of other children who have epilepsy. In her job as a gymnastics teacher at the YWCA in my hometown of Lakewood, OH, Emily Eskra demonstrates that freedom from disability every day. Through her 5-day odyssey, she hopes to reach a wider audience with her message of understanding.

While older views of epilepsy as a curse or as something to be ashamed of have become less common, similar myths about the disease still abound. I hope that by bringing Emily Eskra's story to the attention of my colleagues, I can offer some small assistance in her effort at public education. With as brave and loving teacher as Emily Eskra, I am confident that the effort will ultimately be a success.

I commend to my colleagues' attention the following article from the Cleveland Plain Dealer about Emily Eskra's "marathon of hope:"

A MARATHON OF HOPE—MOM'S OFF FOR DAUGHTER, EPILEPSY

(By Tracey L. Robinson)

It is said that there is no greater love than that between a mother and daughter.

When Emily Eskra, 24, of Lakewood, begins a 450-mile run and bike-a-thon for epilepsy from Public Square to the steps of the Capitol in Washington, D.C., she will be highlighting a special bond between her and her 1-year-old daughter, Abby. She begins her journey today at 8:30 a.m.

Both mother and daughter have epilepsy, a disorder caused by recurring electrical disturbances in the brain. The disorder causes seizures, which can be controlled by medication. Most victims lead normal lives.

More than 2 million Americans, or about 1 percent of the population, have epilepsy. Doctors estimate that one-third of the victims are not being treated out of fear or ignorance, according to the Epilepsy Foundation of Northeast Ohio.

Eskra and a friend, Lynn Brogan, will share a two-seater, 15-speed bike for their journey, which aims to increase public understanding of epilepsy.

Eskra's husband, Richard, will accompany the team in a mobile unit as they pedal to their destination. The children will be flown to Washington to meet their parents when they arrive Sept. 13.

The event is sponsored by the Epilepsy Foundation of Northeast Ohio and the Ciba-Geigy Pharmaceutical Co., which produces Tegretol, a medication for epilepsy.

Eskra said her most important goal was to try to make Abby's life a little easier by tearing down the stereotypes people had about people with epilepsy.

"People are so afraid of people who have epilepsy because having a seizure is not a pretty sight," Eskra said. Eskra, a gymnastics teacher, at the neighborhood YWCA, recalled the reaction of her pupils when a mild seizure overlook her thin-framed body.

"Afterward, the kids treated me so differently, as if I were going to break," she said.

She also spoke of the difficulty of hiring baby sitters for Abby because of their fear of the disorder.

Abby is a cherubic-looking toddler who gets a big bang out of plopping wet kisses on her brother, Brian, 2. She is unaware of her disorder except that she must take medication every day.

Abby inherited epilepsy from her mother. The disease is commonly inherited, although many doctors have observed that head injuries and high fevers might contribute to the disorder.

Eskra began to experience seizures when she was 18, after she suffered a head injury while teaching a gymnastics pupil to perform a back handspring.

Pat Nobili, executive director of the Epilepsy Foundation of Northeast Ohio, explained that people with epilepsy were sometimes denied jobs because employers thought they were a high risk.

In the past, people with epilepsy were commonly committed to institutions and forbidden to marry. In some cases, they were prevented from entering the country.

"It was seen as a curse," Nobili said. "It was something to be felt ashamed of."

That attitude has changed dramatically, she said, as more people became knowledgeable about epilepsy.

"I had a roommate in college who had epilepsy, and I used to laugh," Nobili said. "I was afraid of her. But it is not a laughing matter. I can really relate to her now and see why it is important to do something about it."

Nobili admitted that she was skeptical about Eskra's intentions for a run and bike-a-thon, wondering why one woman would want to take on such an event. But Eskra's convictions changed her mind.

"I know that this woman is very invested in this," Nobili said.

Eskra said, "I am doing what I have intended to do for a long time. Even though it's a year and a half later, I'm doing it."

"I saw the dedication that Emily had," said Brogan, 22, who also works at the Lakewood YWCA. Brogan heard her co-worker talk about her ideas for fund-raisers, and she finally became convinced to join Eskra's effort.

Eskra has been involved in numerous fund-raisers for epilepsy, but decided that a run and bike-a-thon would be one way to get the word out "instead of beating a brass drum," she said.

Brogan and Eskra trained for the upcoming event by lifting weights, swimming and doing aerobics. This will not be a one-time effort, Eskra said. She is already looking forward to another long-distance journey.

"I can't stop," she said. "I cannot keep the public aware if I stop."

The spirited mother plans to keep a diary for her daughter and hopes one day Abby will bike with her.

"I want her to share this with me," she said. "This is for her."

THE RETIREMENT OF MR. DON SAVIO

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, recently, a leading citizen of my hometown of Lexington, MO retired after 35 years in the banking profession. Don Savio last month ended his banking career, the last 9 years of which he served as president of which was originally known as the Commercial Bank and later became the Charter Bank of Lexington, and finally, Boatman's Bank of Lexington.

During those 35 years, Mr. Savio not only served the community well and was active in civic affairs, but he made many friends and was the epitome of what a banker should be. He is a native Lexingtonion, a U.S. Army veteran, and a graduate of the graduate school of banking at the University of Wisconsin. He and his charming wife Annabelle have three daughters and three grandchildren.

I wish Annabelle and Don Savio the very best in the years ahead for a happy and fulfilling retirement.

ISRAELI MEDICINE AS A BRIDGE TO THE ARABS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, while the problems between Israel and her Arab neighbors will not disappear overnight, I am gratified to say that an innovative radio program on Israel's overseas Arabic service has provided medical advice and assistance to thousands of loyal listeners in the Arab world.

Through the medium of international broadcasting, Israel has rendered assistance to neighboring peoples in a way which would be impossible through official governmental channels. While encouraging progress is being made at present in the area of negotiations in the Middle East, a simple yet very effective technique such as this one is to be praised.

Through greater understanding among the peoples of the Middle East, peace will surely come to that turbulent part of the globe.

With these thoughts in mind, I commend the following article from the New York Times to my colleagues in the Congress.

ISRAELI BROADCAST "DOCTOR" IS A RADIO BRIDGE TO ARABS

(By Thomas L. Friedman)

JERUSALEM, August 31.—Ilani Basri is not a household name in Israel. In fact, few Israelis have heard of her.

But Mrs. Basri, 54 years old, has become one of the most widely listened-to Israeli voices in the Arab world today. She probably gets more mail from places like Saudi Arabia and Syria than anyone in Israel.

Since 1971 Mrs. Basri has had a program on the Israeli radio's Arabic service called "Doctor Behind the Microphone," and it has become a vehicle for the Arab-Israeli cooperation.

Twice a week Mrs. Basri, an Iraqi Jew who came to Israel in 1950, interviews Jewish and Arab doctors in Israel about the latest advances in treatments and medical technology in Israeli hospitals. After the interviews, Mrs. Basri invites her listeners throughout the Arab world to write to her—at a special post office box in Geneva or by any other route—with their medical problems.

300 LETTERS A MONTH

Each month 300 letters from Arab listeners find their way to Mrs. Basri's office. She translates them into Hebrew and refers them to specialists at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem or other Israeli medical centers.

The specialists answer the medical queries with whatever limited advice is possible, which Mrs. Basri translates into Arabic and broadcasts on her 30-minute program, or they ask the listener to send more medical records from a local doctor in order to better diagnose the problem. Those who send their records, and are determined by an Israeli specialist to be treatable, are invited by Mrs. Basri on the air to come to Israel, at their own expense.

Mrs. Basri personally arranges all visas through the Interior Ministry and accompanies everyone who comes to the hospital. Every year dozens of Arabs, including Kuwaitis, Qataris, Saudi Arabians, Libyans and Syrians, are quietly getting treatment in Israeli hospitals as a result of her program.

"Diseases don't know any boundaries," Mrs. Basri said, "and I don't feel that treatments should either."

Her efforts have won praise from Israeli doctors. "She is doing a remarkable job in improving relations between us and the Arabs," said Dr. Yaacov Shanon of Bikur Holim Hospital in Jerusalem, who has treated scores of Arab patients referred by Mrs. Basri.

"There is a new generation of very good young doctors in the Arab world, but not everyone has access to them," he added. "The cases that are coming to us are usually the most difficult ones from both a diagnostic and a therapeutic point of view."

Because of the problems involved for a Kuwaiti or a Syrian in traveling to Israel—a country with which their Governments are technically at war and to which a visit would be punishable by a long prison term—Mrs. Basri is discreet in her responses. Most listeners do not sign their letters to her by name but use their initials or a code name related to their illness.

On the air, Mrs. Basri may reply: "To the bird without wings in Kuwait, the doctor says he thinks he can treat you here. Please send me your passport details." Or: "To A. B. in Saudi Arabia, your visa has been approved by the Interior Ministry. You can pick it up at the Allenby Bridge on the Jordan River between Aug. 15 and Sept. 1. The visa is good for one month. Call me on arrival at Jerusalem, and I will take you to the doctor."

SOME PROMINENT LISTENERS

With its 1.2-million-watt transmitter, one of the most powerful in the Middle East, Israel's Arabic service reaches listeners from Morocco to Iraq. It is an open secret that it is tuned in at coffeehouses and in taxis in every Arab capital and Presidents Hafez al-Assad of Syria and Amin Gemayel of Lebanon are known to be regular listeners.

Edmond Sehayek, the director of the Arabic service, said his station received mail from across the Arab world, including frequent love letters to female newscasters. A Libyan military attaché even telephoned recently from a European embassy to complain about a commentary on the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi.

"More than half the mail, though, is for Ilana," Mr. Sehayak said. "Besides our main feature-newsreel, hers is our most popular show."

Every morning Mrs. Basri opens envelopes sent through Geneva or some other European capital or delivered by Arabs who have crossed the bridge from Jordan to the West Bank. There is no mail service between Israel and any Arab country except Egypt.

The letters are often desperate tales of disease, most of them eye, skin and fertility problems. Many writers send electrocardiograms, blood test results, dental charts and X-rays.

"I have medical records from hospitals all over the Arab world," said Mrs. Basri, displaying a sample from Mubaraak al-Kabeer Hospital in Kuwait.

A typical letter this week came from a 48-year-old Syrian woman. The letter, mailed in London, begins: "Dear Doctor Behind the Microphone: Salaam, and good health to you. I am paralyzed in my legs. I have been getting physical therapy, but I still have very bad pains. I heard you speaking about achievements in rehabilitation in Israel, and I want to know if I can be treated in your hospital. Please bring my letter to a doctor in Israel. I am ready to come."

SEEKING VISAS IN EUROPE

Each year, according to Foreign Ministry sources, hundreds of Arabs go to Israeli embassies in Europe and ask for visas to fly to Israel for treatment.

On the wall next to her desk Mrs. Basri has a picture of a Syrian girl and her father in Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv. The man went to an Israeli embassy in Europe, got a visa and flew to Tel Aviv with his ailing daughter. Then he called Mrs. Basri.

"He told me his daughter was suffering from pains in the belly and a high fever and he could not get any doctor to get it to go away," Mrs. Basri said. "I told him, 'Stay at the hotel, I will come and pick you up.' In the meantime I called Professor Mordechai Prass, a specialist in internal medicine at Tel Hashomer. He treated her for familial Mediterranean fever. She stayed in the hospital for two weeks and came out fine. Before they left, they insisted that a photographer come and take this picture with the doctor."

The letters go on and on. A woman from Kuwait wants to consult a fertility expert about having a test-tube baby. A Saudi man says he heard Mrs. Basri's program in a taxi from Saudi Arabia to Jordan and wondered if she could do something for his eye problems.

Mrs. Basri got the idea for the program 14 years ago while lying in a heart-care unit in an Israeli hospital and noticing how much of the medical equipment was marked "Made in Israel." At the time she was a secretary at the Arabic service. She eventually convinced officials of the potential for such a program, and the files in her office bulging with handwritten Arabic letters are testimony to her intuition.

"But even I," Mrs. Basri said, "never thought the program would end up being such a live bridge that Arabs would use to cross into Israel."

THOMAS F. KEYES, JR., OUTSTANDING JURIST

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring Judge Thomas F. Keyes, Jr., who is retiring after 11 years of outstanding service as judge of Probate Court for New Haven and Woodbridge, in Connecticut's Third Congressional District.

During my 10 years as an attorney representing poor and elderly people in the New Haven area, I knew Judge Keyes as a fine jurist with a keen legal mind, who excelled in making fair decisions in difficult cases.

But in my view Judge Keyes' greatest contribution has been in humanizing the judicial process, which so often can be rigid and intimidating to those who find themselves within it.

Often the people who came before Judge Keyes were going through great difficulty, especially in cases involving estates, civil commitments, and contested guardianship. Many were elderly. Many were poor. Many were not represented by an attorney.

Judge Keyes made sure that everyone who came into his court was treated with courtesy and respect. Following his example, his probate court staff was always patient and helpful in assisting unrepresented people with their papers.

In the courtroom, Judge Keyes was unfailingly kind, thorough, and helpful. He listened carefully to everyone. Even people who did not prevail always felt that their viewpoints had been heard.

Judge Keyes has always had a special concern for the poor. Long before Connecticut had a civil fee waiver statute, he regularly waived fees for indigent people.

Judge Keyes has a long history of service to the community. He was the first legal aid director of New Haven, and he served as corporation counsel of New Haven during two city administrations. He is a member of the board of Saint Raphael's Hospital and a devoted communicant of Saint Aidan's Church.

Judge Keyes will be missed, but his probate court will be in good hands—he will be succeeded as probate judge by his son, John Keyes.

This Saturday night Judge Keyes' many friends and colleagues will be honoring him at a testimonial dinner in New Haven. I will be proud to join them on that occasion, and I am very proud to ask my colleagues to join me in honoring him here today.

MIXED CREDITS

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, among the many new approaches to restoring American competitiveness bursting on the scene in response to rising trade deficits is an initiative whose time has come. It's aggressive, it's nonprotectionist, it promotes exports while leveraging adherence to free trade principles, and it fights for American jobs.

I am talking about taking strong defensive action to counter mixed credits, a practice used extensively by our trading partners to unfairly subsidize exports by mixing regular financing with foreign aid grants. Currently, grant elements of less than 25 percent are prohibited under the OECD arrangement.

Today, I am reintroducing legislation to give teeth to our own defensive mixed credits program, which was established in 1983 but has not been pursued aggressively by either Eximbank or AID. The unfair use, or "abuse," of mixed credits to win export contracts is a major problem and its use by foreign countries is increasing despite our best efforts at negotiating an end to such practices.

In 1983, France offered $1.3 billion in support for her exporters, including $600 million in mixed credits. Britain increased its mixed credit activity to $800 million in 1984. Canada boasted a $900 million mixed credit fund in 1981. It has been estimated that American exporters are losing from $3.5 to $7 billion per year to foreign competitors due to a lack of fully competitive financing.

The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development [OECD] estimated in 1980 that export subsidies among member countries reached $5.5 billion, including $2.6 billion in mixed credit activity. The OECD estimates that mixed credits offers will top the $6 billion mark this year.

The Coalition for Employment through Exports [CEE], a business, labor, and government group, estimated that its membership lost $7 billion in sales in a 9-month period during 1983–84.

The President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise estimated that the dollar value of mixed credits offered increased from $2 billion in 1982 to $3.5 billion in 1983. In addition to an increase in the amount and number of mixed credits offered, it found that the number of offering countries has also risen. Mexico and South Korea are beginning to use mixed credit financing to win exports. It found France to be the major culprit, with over 50 percent of reported mixed credit offers. While France has cut the size (dollar value) of the mixed credit offers since 1980, the number of offers has tripled.

It's time to fight fire with fire. We can't afford not to. If we are not competitive, we will lose our market share. U.S. mixed credits offers are defensive only and will give our negotiators leverage at the trade talks. But who are we kidding? Competitive financing will help level the playing field for our exporters.

NEW JERSEY BLACK ISSUES CONVENTION

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to pay tribute to an event that will take place in New Jersey this weekend—the New Jersey Black Issues Convention.

The black issues convention was founded in 1983 to establish a network of communication and cooperation among representatives of black organizations in our State. It has sponsored a series of issue area workshops around the State designed to gather, analyze, and disseminate information on topics of concern to the black community. The convention drew 1,620 attendees last year, and this year's convention at the Somerset Hilton in Franklin Township promises to be an equally impressive gathering.

Rev. Jesse Jackson, founder of Operation PUSH and former Presidential candidate, will be the keynote speaker. The title of his September 14 address is the same as the theme of the convention: "Moving Up the Rough Side of the Mountain."

Other highlights will be a debate between the two gubernatorial candidates, Gov. Thomas Kean and Essex County Executive Peter Shapiro; and addresses by Earl Graves, publisher of Black Enterprise magazine and Rev. Tom Skinner of the Martin Luther King Center for Non-Violent Change.

Symposiums and issue panels will be held on the following topics: The movement to free South Africa; national budget, tax reform, and public policy; teenage pregnancy; the labor movement and the black community; minority business development; and equity and excellence in education.

Under the leadership of Newark Councilman-at-Large Donald Tucker, the New Jersey Black Issues Convention has brought together a consortium of statewide organizations, such as the State Conference of NAACP branches, the Council of Urban Leagues, the New Jersey Contingent of Black Local Elected Officials, and New Jersey Section of the National Council of Negro Women to provide informational and educational services to the black community statewide.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all my colleagues join me in saluting the New Jersey Black Issues Convention. I am certain that this year's convention will be a tremendous success and will prove to be beneficial to all the participants.

THE NATIONAL SCHOOLBUS SAFETY ACT OF 1985

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing "The National Schoolbus Safety Act of 1985." My bill would require mandatory installation and use of seat belts in all new schoolbuses. This bill grew out of the need to improve the safety requirements that our children follow while riding back and forth to school each day and the belief that safety belts play an important role in saving lives.

The need for this bill is obvious. According to the U.S. Department of Transportation, motor vehicle accidents are the No. 1 killer of children under the age of 15. In 1983, 390,000 schoolbuses transported 21,500,000 pupils daily and traveled 3 billion miles over the course of the year. The National Safety Council estimated that 3,300 children were injured in schoolbus related accidents in 1983. In the 1984–85 school year, over 8,400 actual injuries to children were reported. It is quite likely that as many as 50,000 actual injuries to schoolchildren went unreported between 1973 and 1983.

Under my proposal, States would be required in 1 year to install seat belts in all new schoolbuses and to inspect all schoolbuses annually to ensure child safety to and from school. My bill will apply to every vehicle that is rented, leased, or owned by a school district and used for the transporting of schoolchildren. If the States do not institute such a program, Federal education funds would be withheld at the rate of 5 percent the first year, 10 percent the second year, and 15 percent the third and subsequent years. By the year 1995, all schoolbuses would be required to have seatbelts as standard equipment, or else all Federal education funding would be withheld.

Critics of this legislation maintain that the "Compartmentalization Theory" protects our children from injury. In 1977, new safety regulations raised the schoolbus seat to 24 inches and called for seat padding. It has been proven in frontal and rear end collisions that on impact this compartmentalization provides somewhat adequate protection. However, the biggest danger to schoolchildren is a rollover accident, when children are thrown around the bus or through its windows. A padded crash barrier would not keep the child in his compartment since the child would just fall off the seat into the aisle.

A group of 70 fourth grade schoolchildren from the University School of Nova University, Fort Lauderdale, FL, devoted their social studies class to the study of seatbelts on schoolbuses. I cannot share every letter with you. However, I would like to share some poignant insights only children could make. Marni Orlove writes, "Who cares about how much they cost. Parents care more about their children than the cost of seat belts." Lauren Levin writes, "When kids put on their seat belts in a car it becomes a habit. So kids should put [on] seat belts on every moving vehicle they ride." Rejoice Hanson writes, "At the head of the bus there's a sign that says 'your operator wears a seat belt for your safety,' but what good will that do for our children riding schoolbuses?" Ronnie Levin writes, "When Tylenol was poisoned they put safety caps on . . . In 1984, 15 people died on schoolbuses. I think the safety cap for schoolbuses would be seat belts."

Installation of seatbelts on schoolbuses is endorsed by many organizations, including: Physicians for Automotive Safety; National Coalition for Seat Belts on Schoolbuses; American College of Emergency Physicians; American Academy of Pediatrics; American Medical Association; and the American College of Preventive Medicine.

Seatbelts save lives. We hear so much about the dangers our children face, and most of those dangers are beyond our control. The lack of safetybelts on our schoolbuses is an unnecessary danger that we can control, and it is time to change that.

Laws for mandatory seatbelts for passenger automobiles have been passed or are now under consideration in every State legislature. Child restraint laws are commonplace in 49 out of 50 States. The mood of the Nation is to protect its citizens, especially its children, against one of the leading causes of death in the United States—automobile accidents.

I hope my colleagues will join me by cosponsoring this important legislation. For your benefit, the text of my bill follows:

H.R. 3305

A bill to establish restrictions on the provision of financial assistance by the Department of Education to educational agencies in States or other political subdivisions that do not impose certain requirements relating to the inspection and equipping with safety belts of schoolbuses

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Schoolbus Safety Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. INITIAL SAFETY BELT AND INSPECTION REQUIREMENTS.

(a) DUTIES OF SECRETARY OF EDUCATION.—The Secretary of Education may not obligate or expend, with respect to any amount appropriated to the Department of Education that is allocated for the provision of financial assistance to any State educational agency or local educational agency that operates within a State that is not in compliance with the requirements of subsection (b) (as determined by the Secretary) and a political subdivision that is not in compliance with such requirements—

(1) more than 95 percent of such amount for any fiscal year beginning after the effective date of this Act;

(2) more than 90 percent of such amount for any fiscal year beginning with the second fiscal year beginning after the effective date of this Act; and

(3) more than 85 percent of such amount for any subsequent fiscal year.

(b) REQUIREMENTS FOR COMPLIANCE.—Any State or political subdivision within which any State educational agency or local educational agency operates shall require—

(1) the equipping with safety belts of each schoolbus first placed in service after the effective date of this Act; and

(2) the safety inspection of all schoolbuses at least annually by the appropriate State or local agency.

(c) LATE COMPLIANCE.—No additional reduction in funding shall be made under paragraph (2) or (3) of subsection (a) after the date on which the State or political subdivision within which the educational agency operates requires—

(1) the equipping with safety belts of each schoolbus first placed in service after such date; and

(2) the inspection of all schoolbuses at least annually by the appropriate State or local agency.

SEC. 3. FUTURE SAFETY BELT REQUIREMENTS.

The Secretary may not obligate or expend any amount appropriated to the Department of Education that is allocated for the provision of financial assistance to any State educational agency or local educational agency unless the State or political subdivision within which such agency operates has in effect a requirement that was effective on or before January 1, 1995, that—

(1) all schoolbuses shall be equipped with safety belts; and

(2) all schoolbuses shall be inspected at least annually by the appropriate State or local agency.

SEC. 4. PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO SECRETARY OF EDUCATION.

(a) STATE OR LOCAL HIGHWAY SAFETY PROGRAM IN EFFECT.—If the State or political subdivision within which any State educational agency or local educational agency operates has in effect a highway safety program for pupil transportation safety approved under section 402 of title 23, United States Code, the Secretary of Transportation, at least annually, shall provide the Secretary of Education with the information necessary to determine whether such State or political subdivision has in effect the requirements referred to in sections 2 and 3.

(b) NO STATE OR LOCAL HIGHWAY SAFETY PROGRAM IN EFFECT.—Any State educational agency or local educational agency that operates within a State or political subdivision where no highway safety program for pupil transportation safety has been approved under section 402 of title 23, United States Code, shall provide the Secretary of Education with the information necessary to determine whether such State or political subdivision has in effect the requirements referred to in sections 2 and 3.

SEC. 5. DEFINITIONS.

For purpose of this Act:

(1) The term "local educational agency" has the meaning given such term in section 1001(f) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 3381(f)).

(2) The term "safety belt" means an occupant restraint system consisting of lap belts.

(3) The term "schoolbus" means a passenger motor vehicle that is owned, operated, leased or otherwise hired by a school system for the purpose of transporting preprimary, primary, or secondary school students to or from such schools or events related to such schools.

(4) The term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States.

(5) The term "State educational agency" has the meaning given such term in section 1001(k) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 3381(k)).

SEC. 6. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act shall become effective upon the expiration of the 1-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act.

STUDENT LOAN MATERNITY DEFERRAL ACT OF 1985

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce H.R. 3249, the Student Loan Maternity Deferral Act of 1985.

This legislation will make the Higher Education Act of 1965 more flexible for the special needs of new mothers. It amends the Higher Education Act to allow women, during maternity, to have a 6-month period of deferment on repayment of Federal student financial aid loans.

Current law mandates that a student must begin repayment of Federal education loans 6 months after the end of a term of study, if the student will not be enrolled full time for the following term. In special hardship cases, such as injury or unemployment, an individual can reenroll on a part-time basis and maintain their loan deferral as well as be eligible to receive Federal financial aid.

The Student Loan Maternity Deferral Act will make maternity one of these conditions. Hence, new mothers would be able to take a leave from school, return after 6 months, and be eligible to attend school part time for a period of 6 months so that they can spend more time with their newborn.

A recent case in Wisconsin points out an inequity in current law. A woman took a semester off to have a baby and when she returned to school, she wished to continue as a part-time student. She did not want to take on a full course load because she wanted to spend time with her newborn son.

She hoped her situation would allow her to fall into the hardship category so that her loan would be deferred for a period of time. However, under current law, the physical incapacitation of maternity does not qualify a woman for loan deferral under the hardship definition.

By not extending the hardship definition for maternity, the Federal Government is discouraging women from having children while they are in school. If they do have a child, they feel they must return immediately to full-time education. The alternative: Begin payback on their Federal student loans.

The law was written to discourage students from unnecessarily prolonging their education and their financial debt to the Federal Government by taking too many leaves from full-time education. However, the law does not allow sufficient flexibility for the special circumstances of new mothers.

This change in the law is essential. It provides a new mother the flexibility needed to continue her education while spending important time with her child during the first months of life.

This change will not cost the Federal Government. It merely defers the student loan repayment for 6 months to allow the new mother additional time to balance her many financial and time commitments.

I ask my colleagues for their support for this simple and sensible adjustment in the law.

MSGR. PAUL E. METZGER RETIRES

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, this coming Sunday, September 15, 1985, will mark the occasion of the retirement of one of the leading clergymen in my congressional district, as well as a very close personal friend, Msgr. Paul E. Metzger. He will conclude 42 years in the priesthood, including the last 26 years at St. John's Catholic Church in Bellaire, OH.

A native of New Philadelphia, OH, he studied at St. Charles Seminary in Columbus, OH for 8 years, followed by 4 years of theological study at Mt. St. Mary's Seminary in Cincinnati, OH. He was ordained by the late Bishop Joseph Hartley for the Columbus Diocese on April 17, 1943, and served 5 years as pastor of St. Mary's Church in Pine Grove, OH.

When the Diocese of Steubenville, OH was created, Bishop John King Mussion assigned Monsignor Metzger as pastor to Our Lady of Mercy Church at Carrollton, OH and St. Mary's Church in Morges, OH, and in 1953, appointed him as pastor of St. Joseph's Church in Wolfhurst, OH, where he served another 5 years before finally being transferred to St. John's in 1959.

Monsignor Metzger was placed in charge of the building and financing of the $300,000 second addition to St. John's High School and as director of the Diocesan Catholic Charities, a position he held for 18 years, Father Metzger also supervised the construction of St. John's Villa Children's Home. He also played a leading role in several other construction projects of the church over the years.

In addition to his work in the parish, Monsignor Metzger took an active part in civic affairs on the city and county level. A primary example of this is the leadership he provided as the orginator of Bel Capre, a housing project in which St. John's Church and the Bellaire Presbyterian churches cooperated to form the Bellaire Housing Foundation which constructed single homes and apartments to ease the housing shortage in the area. Father Metzger is also very active in many other housing projects designed for the care of the mentally retarded, the aged, and the handicapped.

On a more personal note, Father Metzger has served on my military academy selection committee for several years and has assisted me in the selection of many qualified young men and women for entrance to our military academies.

Mr. Speaker, as Monsignor Metzger begins his retirement, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him on this occasion and to thank him on behalf of so many people for the work he has performed over the years, his friendship, and his kindness in ways too numerable to mention here.

God speed, Monsignor Paul Metzger.

OUTSTANDING VA RESEARCH ON ANTI-EPILEPTIC DRUGS CITED

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Veterans' Administration on the recent completion of a 6-year study of four major anticonvulsant drugs. The VA epilepsy cooperative study reported recently in the New England Journal of Medicine, was the largest long-term cooperative assessment of antiepileptic drug therapy ever undertaken. In the study, investigators compared the efficacy and toxicity of 4 drugs in 622 adults in 10 VA medical centers. Patients were randomly administered one of four drugs usually used to treat seizures in adults: carbamazapine, phenobarbitol, phenytoin, and primidone. They then were followed for 2 years, or until the drug failed to control seizures or caused unacceptable side effects.

As one who has epilepsy, I was very interested in the work being done by the VA, and recently had an opportunity meet with the study chairman, Dr. Richard Mattson, chief of neurology at the West Haven, CT, VA Medical Center and professor of neurology at Yale Medical School, to discuss his findings. Dr. Mattson found that 75 percent of those studied can be "adequately managed" with proper use of a single antiepileptic drug; however, new drugs and other treatments still are needed to treat the disorder. Dr. Mattson said his research team now plans to compare the effectiveness of valproic acid with carbamazapine. Valproic acid had not received Food and Drug Administration approval at the time of the first study. The results of the new study will not be available for about 5 years.

The work being done by Dr. Mattson and his colleagues is just one example of the outstanding research being done by the Veterans' Administration and I believe my colleagues and the public should be aware of the many accomplishments of VA researchers. VA scientists have received awards, including two Nobel prizes, for research on hypertension, discovery of leukemia and cancer-inducing viruses in animals, and development of the CAT scanner. The VA's research program is authorized by Congress to promote high quality health care for our Nation's veterans. However, the Congress and the general public should know that through the efforts of physicians like Dr. Mattson and his colleagues, research conducted at VA medical centers around the country has enriched the quality of life, not only for veterans, but all of us.

HOSPITALS SHOULD PROVIDE AN OPEN DOOR TO PATIENTS REGARDLESS OF ABILITY TO PAY

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, last week, a matter of life and death came to my attention in the person of Gary Pouillon, a 25-year-old constituent in my Florida congressional district. Gary is suffering from sclerosing cholangitis, a fatal liver disease, and had been given only 1 to 4 weeks to live unless he received a liver transplant. After some research, a Boston Hospital, one of two in the country which perform this surgery, was located and a surgeon, bed, and liver were all waiting to save Gary's life. The Boston Hospital, however, refused to admit Gary for the necessary lifesaving procedure. What was the problem you might ask?

The unfortunate problem is that Gary is poor. Gary is on Social Security disability due to his disease. He did not have any private insurance because he and his family could not afford it, and the total cost for the operation and postoperative care was approximately $200,000. Thus, the hospital, without adequate assurance of payment, was unwilling to admit him.

What about Medicare and Medicaid, you might ask? That possibility was also researched by my staff and a hospital social worker and it was determined that Medicare and Medicaid would not provide coverage because the liver transplant operation is considered experimental. Local welfare agencies, similarly, follow the same guidelines as Medicare and Medicaid regarding this procedure. Finally, the Governor's office had no funds for this purpose, nor did any private organization.

I wanted to help Gary receive treatment and a second chance at life so I contacted Congressman MARKEY, who represents the district in which the hospital is located, and Congressman WAXMAN, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Health and Environment Subcommittee. I would like to personally commend both gentlemen for their willingness to help, for without their help Gary would have certainly died.

The intervention of these Congressmen, then, as well as my personal guarantee to raise $40,000, finally convinced the hospital to admit Mr. Pouillon. Gary is now receiving the life-saving treatment he so desperately needed. As a matter of fact, he shed a few tears of happiness as he managed to give me a weak "thank you" when I went to visit him.

This particular story had a happy ending because Gary is now receiving his treatment. However, this is, unfortunately, but one instance where a problem exists. While Gary's case presents a more complicated situation—the access of individuals to the most sophisticated technology—there are many reported cases where routine emergency services have also been denied because of an individual's inability to pay. What of these people who are in such life-threatening situations and do not have Congressmen and Senators intervening in their behalf? Are their lives any less worthy of saving?

Access to medical care should not be reserved for the well-to-do in this or any other society. As a matter of fact, I think it rather unfitting for the society that has been responsible for the greatest medical advances in history to deny some of its citizens access to the technology.

I believe that we should at least ensure that emergency medical services are available to all. For this reason, I have introduced legislation, House Concurrent Resolution 178, which seeks to promote this end. House Concurrent Resolution 178, introduced on July 26, 1985, expresses the sense of Congress on medical emergencies and states that hospitals should "provide an open door to patients regardless of ability to pay." I consider this bill a first step in defining access to our Nation's medical care system, and I urge all my colleagues to think about this resolution and the greater questions it raises. I am certain that you'll agree that there is probably no worthier piece of legislation to lend your name to than one which could help save lives, and I hope all my colleagues will join me in this effort by cosponsoring House Concurrent Resolution 178.

H.R. 2866—AN OPTION FOR FIREFIGHTERS AND LAW OFFICERS

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on June 25, 1985, I introduced H.R. 2866, a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to permit employees engaged in law enforcement and fire protection activities to take compensatory time off in lieu of receiving overtime pay.

As you know, earlier this year, the U.S. Supreme Court in Garcia versus San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority overruled its decision of 9 years in National League of Cities versus Usery and held that no constitutional limitation exists on the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act [FLSA] to employees of State and local governments. The holding in Garcia potentially subjects the full range of State and local government activities to the Federal minimum wage and overtime law.

There have been several bills introduced in the House that are attempting to erode the rights workers have fought so long to acquire. These bills attempt to "exempt or exclude" all employees of State and local governments from the overtime provision of the act. These attempts to exempt or exclude employees on a wholesale basis from the overtime and the minimum wage provisions of the act would be a step backward. For too long, employers have sought rigorous work schedule adjustments to meet manpower requirements without paying overtime compensation and/or employers have paid workers far below the established minimum wage.

My bill does not attempt to exempt or exclude workers from coverage under the act, but specifically provides an option for employees engaged in fire and law enforcement activities to take "comp" time off in lieu of overtime—only if pursuant to a contractual agreement made between the public agency and such employees individually or an agreement made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of such employees and the public agency and only at the written request of the respective employee.

H.R. 2866 singles out firefighters and law enforcement officers, because of the nature of their daily hazardous activity. If fire and law enforcement agencies were required to adhere to the provision of the act, as it relates to overtime payments, State and local governments would be faced with vast manpower shortages as a result of employees attempting to use their accumulated overtime within the work period in which it was earned. As a result, public safety would be jeopardized and cities across the Nation could find themselves scurrying to develop innovative safety techniques in order to compensate for the vast manpower shortages. In addition, State and local governments would be faced with substantial overtime expenditures if their respective agencies were unable to schedule employees to take their accumulated compensatory time off within the pay period in which the overtime was earned.

Memphis city officials have advised me that compliance with the act could mean requiring a 15- to 20-percent increase in manpower. To the taxpayers of Memphis this could mean an additional $3 million for training and another $750,000 for overtime pay.

While H.R. 2866 is not a panacea, it will grant some relief to already strained city budgets. In addition the Garcia ruling has generated much confusion and could cause substantial hardships to many State and local government employees, especially those involved in hazardous activities unless Congress grants relief.

Mr. Speaker I ask my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation so that we may quickly resolve this potentially grave situation.

BILL DOHERTY AND THE AFL-CIO'S FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

HON. JACK F. KEMP
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, bill Doherty and the American Institute for Free Labor have been champions of America and of freedom. Long before public attention in the United States turned to the threat of communism in this hemisphere, Bill Doherty and his AIFLD troops were devoting their hard work—and sometimes risking their lives—to advance and protect free labor movements in our sister American republics. And their work has paid off, in El Salvador, in Honduras, in Ecuador, and in every country where AIFLD has established a presence.

It has been my pleasure to work with Lane Kirkland and Bill Doherty, and to call them friends. Lane and I served together on the Bipartisan Commission on Central America and Bill served as an adviser. Their efforts were instrumental in fashioning bipartisan consensus and the sound policy guidance that came out of the Commission's work. Bill has appeared many times before the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, where I serve as the ranking Republican, to offer valuable testimony, counsel, and advice on U.S. foreign assistance programs throughout the region. His personal dedication to advancing the cause of democracy has been unceasing.

Mr. Speaker, this month's issue of Reader's Digest contains an article by Donald Robinson detailing some of the accomplishments of this remarkable American. I ask that the article be reprinted in the RECORD, as a salute to the freedom fighters of AIFLD and their determined commander, Bill Doherty.

The article follows:

BILL DOHERTY'S BLUE-COLLAR FREEDOM FIGHTERS

(By Donald Robinson)

Hours after U.S. troops landed on Grenada in October 1983, communist propaganda blasted the invasion as an "imperialist assault" on the Grenadan people.

A gutsy U.S. labor leader answered the communists' big lie. William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), wangled his way into Grenada before the shooting had stopped and contacted the heads of two unions. Both had fought Grenada's Marxist dictators with Doherty's support. He told them that a resolution condemning the American landing was about to be introduced at an international labor conference in Barbados. The three raced to the meeting.

"What do you mean we were invaded?" the Grenadans declared. "We were rescued." When the resolution was defeated overwhelmingly, democratic unionists everywhere took heart.

A hidden army of Soviet and Cuban agents is seeking control of Latin America's 50-million-member labor movement. Command of the trade unions would give the Kremlin a pivotal weapon against pro-Western governments. AIFLD, a band of brave men and women led by Doherty for 23 years, is spearheading resistance not only to the communists but to right-wing extremists as well.

It's been a savage struggle. More than 50 of Doherty's allies have been murdered, including two of his closest aides, and Doherty has received many death threats himself. But despite the odds, AIFLD has won notable victories.

In Honduras it helped to recapture the fruit workers' union from the communists, who had stolen union elections by casting votes for countless "ghost" workers.

In Ecuador the communists got a stranglehold on the Confederation of Ecuadoran Workers (CFE), the major labor organization. CFE was so strong that no Ecuadoran worker could drive a truck without its approval. AIFLD helped organize the Ecuadoran Confederation of Free Trade Unions (CEOSL) to oppose the Marxists. When CFE called a general strike to topple the democratic government, CEOSL licked it. Today, every major union in Ecuador is led by pro-democratic elements.

The Marxist dictator of Surinam was forced to reorganize his cabinet last year to include labor and business representatives after a series of strikes and international protests spearheaded by AIFLD.

A strapping man of 58, Bill Doherty has white hair, a full beard and bright-blue eyes that make him look like Santa Claus. But he can be tough. One day in 1980, he drove 30 miles through Paraguayan jungle to a barbarous prison in Ypacaray that few, if any, North Americans had ever visited. There he demanded to meet with 19 union leaders incarcerated for advocating democracy. When soldiers pointed machine guns at him, Doherty promptly held a press conference.

"When I see this Hitler-like concentration camp, I think I'm in Havana," he told reporters who had accompanied him. "This is how Fidel Castro treats labor leaders." After the press published Doherty's remarks, rightist dictator Alfredo Stroessner released the labor leaders and later closed the prison.

Doherty is a quick-witted speaker. In 1956, he debated Chilean communist Clotario Blest before 2500 communications workers in Santiago. Doherty wanted the workers to affiliate with the pro-Western Postal, Telephone and Telegraph International (PTTI). Blest was bitterly opposed.

"Why do these well-dressed gringos come here, stay in first-class hotels, go to our best restaurants and tell us they represent the working class?" Blest sneered.

"Because we will not feel successful, Brother Blest," Doherty responded, "until you and all the workers in Chile dress well, stay in those hotels and eat the best meals. We're not here to destroy the capitalists. We want to live like them." The workers roared approval and voted to affiliate with the PTTI.

Doherty was born into the labor movements. His father was president of the National Association of Letter Carriers for 21 years. After air-combat duty during World War II, young Bill spent two years in a Catholic seminary before going to law school.

Doherty went to work in 1954 as Latin American representative of the PTTI. In those days, collective bargaining was nonexistent for most unions in Latin America; pay raises were obtained through rioting.

Determined to fight this, Doherty founded AIFLD and, with the backing of AFL-CIO president George Meany, built it into an activist organization that now has offices in 16 countries, a staff of 56 trade unionists and an $8-million annual budget. Ninety percent of its funds come from the U.S. Agency for International Development, the remainder from the AFL-CIO. Says Doherty: "Communists target organized labor for one reason—to secure power over foreign governments. We believe in a trade-union movement independent of governments, political parties, employers."

I recently traveled throughout Latin America observing AIFLD close up. Here's what I learned:

In war-torn El Salvador, AIFLD has helped organize 350,000 Salvadoran farmers and urban workers into democratic unions. With AIFLD's help, the farmers have forced cooperatives that buy land and pay workers to cultivate it.

The cost in blood of AIFLD's Salvadoran successes has been high. In January 1981, two AIFLD staffers and the director of the Salvadoran land-reform program were machine-gunned to death while drinking coffee in the Hotel Sheraton in San Salvador. But the AIFLD staff has resolved to say. "We want to make sure the blood of our colleagues was not spilled in vain," says Doherty.

In Guatemala, AIFLD has helped to revive a democratic labor movement enfeebled by repressive dictatorships. Doherty's people had to risk their lives to accomplish it. In 1970, Guatamalan soldiers broke into the house of Jose Estrada, an American citizen who was the AIFLD director, and dragged him off to prison.

The U.S. embassy obtained Estrada's release. But five days later his home was searched; his books and papers were confiscated. This time the U.S. embassy suggested he leave the country.

Estrada left, but returned a month later. By last year, when elections were held in Guatemala for an assembly to draft a constitution, several labor leaders ran for office, and one was elected.

Castro's Cuba is another battlefield. Working closely with Cuban exiles, AIFLD exposes the tyrannies of the regime. Not long ago, AIFLD raised an international furor that saved the lives of farmers sentenced to death for trying to organize a union in the Cuban sugar fields.

AIFLD is also in the vanguard of the struggle against the Marxist-Leninist government of Nicaragua. AIFLD has been working with Nicaraguan exiles in the United States and Latin America to rally international opinion against the Sandinista regime.

AIFLD's greatest effort is in education. To date, 469,067 trade unionists have studied comparative economic systems, union leadership, collective bargaining and theories of democracy under AIFLD teachers in 17 Latin American countries. AIFLD has brought more than 4000 labor leaders to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md. Many graduates of the six-week course have risen high in the Latin American trade-union movement.

AIFLD has also helped establish hospitals, schools, credit unions and labor centers throughout Latin America. No project is too small. In Guyana, AIFLD representative John Heberle constructed a footbridge over a creek so children could get to school without dodging crocodiles.

Latin America's strong desire for democracy and economic aid and the efforts of AIFLD and similar organizations have had quite an impact. Six years ago, two-thirds of the people in Latin America and the Caribbean lived under dictatorships or military-dominated governments. Today, 90 percent of them live in democracies or under governments strongly leaning toward democracy.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D., Texas) and Rep. Jack Kemp (R., N.Y.), among our most knowledgeable legislators on Latin America, have praised AIFLD for its tireless work in fostering a democractic labor movement throughout the hemisphere. "It was the drive and commitment of Bill Doherty that made this possible," says Wright. Adds Kemp, "Freedom-loving people everywhere owe Doherty and his colleagues an eternal debt of gratitude."

INTERNATIONAL TRADE CHALLENGES

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Representative TOBY ROTH, who serves as the ranking Republican member of the prestigious House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade, has emerged as one of the leading analysts in Congress of the international trade challenges confronting this Nation. Today, Congressman ROTH presented a major trade policy address before the Georgetown University Center for Strategic and International Studies. I commend his novel insights to my colleagues and insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the highlights of his thoughtful remarks.

FOREWORD BY THE HONORABLE MALCOLM BALDRIGE, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

As the issue of trade grows in importance, so does the need to analyze the many factors contributing to the current crisis. In his address, "Trade Pursuits: the Baby-Boomer Edition," Congressman Toby Roth accomplishes this with real perception. As the ranking member of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on International Economic Policy, Toby Roth is a leader in Congress in the development of United States trade policy. His experience has given him insight into the many ramifications of trade analysis and policy.

In his recent address before the Center for Strategic and Informational Studies, Congressman Roth notes that the strong dollar and international barriers to free trade get most of the blame for the country's current trade dilemma. But he argues that these two factors alone are not the sole source of the problem. Congressman Roth maintains that the U.S. must look beyond the external forces affecting the U.S. trade imbalance and examine the domestic readjustments that are needed as well. He provides a detailed analysis of the steps the nation must take to meet the current challenge to its leadership in world trade.

Congressman Roth urges the leaders of government and industry to recognize the realities of global trade and the importance of upholding international free trade. He sees the review of current business strategy and U.S. trade policy which the Congress, the Administration and U.S. industry now has underway as an oppportunity for developing the longrange planning needed to improve U.S. industrial competitiveness at home and abroad.

I commend Congressman Roth's remarks to anyone looking for a concise, well-balanced review of our trade situation, written by someone who will continue to play a major role in developing U.S. trade policy.

TRADE PURSUITS: THE BABY-BOOM EDITION

(An Address by Congressman Toby Roth)

Today I will address the most important issue before our country—the U.S. trade crisis. Although we are now witnessing a trade wild fire spreading out of control, concerned people in and out of government realize that the problem has been smoldering for a long time.

The red ink trade figures are splashed across the newspaper headlines every month. This year our trade deficit is expected to reach $150 billion—one-third of it with one country, Japan. Members of Congress are starting to panic and draconian stop-gap solutions are being thrown into the hopper.

* * * * *

PINPOINTING THE SOURCE OF THE U.S. TRADE PROBLEM

We have all read many speeches and editorials focusing on the causes of our trade competitiveness crisis. Frequently cited as culprits are the high value of the dollar and Japan's nontariff barriers. Both of these factors are extremely important in the trade equation.

The value of the dollar

The strength of the dollar over the past few years has been extremely costly to many American industries—not only in our overseas markets but right here at home.

Take, for example, Caterpillar Tractor Company. Last week, I had a frank discussion with an industrialist contractor in my district who has purchased Caterpillar tractors for many, many years. But this year, instead of buying a Wisconsin-made tractor, he purchased four Japanese Komatsu tractors made over 5,000 miles away. It was not an easy decision to make given that Caterpillar has been a long-time reliable supplier. Nonetheless, a savings of $60,000 on each Japanese tractor is not easy to pass up. Komatsu is able to price its tractors at about 40 percent below Caterpillar simply because of the value of the dollar.

The correlation between the value of the dollar and Caterpillar's tractor sales is quite clear. Six years ago when the dollar was much weaker than today, Caterpillar's prices were head to head with the competition. Over the last few years as the dollar has soared, tractor sales have nosedived. The human price is very steep. Employment at Caterpillar has dropped to only 55 percent of what it was just six years ago.

This is only one example of many where American companies have been losing sales and workers because of the value of the dollar. For industries that are making price-sensitive products, the past few years have been extremely tough.

Japan's trade barriers

Another important source of our trade problems has been the intransigence of the Japanese in removing trade barriers for U.S. products. In sector after sector, the Japanese have found creative ways to bar American products from entering their market. For example, an American steak that costs $4.00 in Wisconsin costs $18.60 in Japan because of their tariffs and controlled distribution system.

WHAT STEPS NEED TO BE TAKEN?

(1) Downward pressure on the dollar

The burden of the "super dollar" hits businesses and manufacturers alike. The effect is the same as a 25 percent tax on exporters and a 25 percent subsidy for importers, making it extremely difficult for our companies to remain competitive. In my view, three things need to take place over the next two years to bring the dollar safely down to a more reasonable level:

(1) We need to pass a serious federal budget deficit reduction package.

(2) In addition to cutting the U.S. budget, the economies of Europe need to adopt policies more conducive to growth in order to bring the dollar down to a more competitive rate.

(3) And, thirdly, Japan needs not only to reduce its barriers to trade, but also to eliminate barriers to its capital markets. A more realistic dollar-yen alignment could help over the long-run to reduce our trade deficit.

(2) Tough negotiating with Japanese

The Japanese must realize that progress in eliminating nontariff barriers must be swift and not stretched out over the next five years or so. Patience is running very thin in the Congress.

(3) Improvement in the conduct of U.S. trade policy

There is considerable room for improvement in the conduct of U.S. trade policy:

(a) Trade Reorganization

We need a Department of Trade and one Cabinet member in charge. We can't afford to have officials from the State Department, the Commerce Department, the Treasury Department, and the U.S. Trade Representative's Office tripping over each other's luggage at Tokyo International Airport as they attempt to negotiate with the Japanese.

(b) Improving Export Controls

With respect to our export licensing operations, there are no less than seven agencies that review license applications for exporting. One report estimates the delays in export licensing costs more than $12 billion a year in lost exports. Two months ago, the President enacted the new Export Administration Act which mandates significant changes. The National Association of Manufacturers called it the most significant trade legislation of the decade. Key, however, is effective implementation of the new law.

(c) Amend Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

I also anticipate that this may be the year to amend the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which as presently written, costs the United States over $1 billion in lost sales each year. The FCPA is a well-intentioned law, but clarifying amendments would better serve U.S. trade interests.

* * * * *

A MISSING PART OF THE PUZZLE

Understanding the origins and components of the trade crisis is the challenge that we have before us today. The problem is complex and the solutions are varied. But in my judgment a critical part of the puzzle is being overlooked. Even if the value of the dollar declines significantly and Japan eliminates all of its nontariff barriers tomorrow, American consumers will continue to import Japanese products in large quantities. If we are going to understand the nature of our competitiveness problem, we have to look at the unique spending patterns of the American consumers that have emerged within the last decade. We must consider the trade crisis on two fronts: first, what is happening in the U.S. market; and secondly, our competitiveness situation in exporting abroad.

I think that until we separate these two markets analytically, we will continue to miss the fundamental source of America's problem and we will fail in our policy prescriptions. Hidden in the trade deficit figures is a national buyer's strike. In the United States, domestic producers are losing their share of the market because of the "yuppie factor."

WHAT IS HAPPENING IN THE U.S. MARKET?

When you look at spending habits and who has the disposable income, it is the baby-boom generation. And for this segment of the market, price is not the determinant factor in a buying decision. Rather, the consumer makes a subconscious long-term evaluation of price based on how long the product is going to last, its aesthetic and prestige value, and its reliability. In short, quality is the number one determining factor. We see this buying pattern all around us.

Take, for example, automobiles. Last weekend I took a stroll through Georgetown. Only about one in twenty cars was American-made; almost all the rest were Japanese models. Now the residents of Georgetown don't have to be that concerned with price. But the automobile of choice was Japanese. So if price is not a consideration, why are Americans buying Japanese cars? Take note of these reports:

Consumer Reports conducted a survey of repairs made on new cars and found that of the 29 cars with the best results, all were foreign made. Of the 20 cars with the poorest results, all were American made.

Consumer Reports conducted a survey on recalls to correct safety defects for automobiles over a four-year period and found that 96 percent of the recalls were for American-made vehicles.

Let's take a look at another industry—the television and video equipment market:

In the 1960s, there were 25 American color TV manufacturers. By 1981, there were only 10 (five of which are foreign-owned.) And today, only 3 U.S. companies are major companies in the market. Eight Japanese firms account for one-third of U.S. sales.

Wage rates are not the reason for Japan's advances. By 1978, hourly wage rates for television manufacturing were the same in the U.S. and Japan. But because of automation, it costs Japanese firms only about half as much to assemble a T.V. The funds have gone into research and development. According to a report by Northwestern University, Japanese manufacturers spent approximately 3.5 percent of their total sales on R&D while American firms spent only 2.3 percent. Sony devoted almost 6 percent of its sales to R&D!

* * * * *

The characteristic that runs throughout these cases is the Japanese commitment to quality and to effective advertizing campaigns. Baby-boomers don't have time for comparison shopping. They will buy a product based on the experiences of their colleagues and based on glimpses from advertizing campaigns.

If we continue to approach our trade problems with Japan on the premise that our problems are solely due to the value of the dollar and trade barriers, the results will be the same as if we were ostriches with our heads in the sand. Our trade deficit with Japan is not a recent phenomenon. The United States has run a trade deficit with Japan every year since 1966—when our dollar has been strong and when it has been weak.

* * * * *

To solve our competitiveness problem at home, much of the challenge and responsibility lands squarely on the shoulders of American industry. Companies are going to have to pay more attention to the details embodied in a quality product. And, company executives are going to have to devote more of their energies to winning the hearts and dollars of the baby-boom generation.

We are facing a tough challenge of worldwide industrial competition, and we have to mobilize our people to understand that. As Kenneth Butterworth, President of Loctite Corporation put it: "The attitude in this country is too much "thank God it's Friday" and not enough "thank God it's Monday."

If we are going to compete successfully, productivity gains have to be coupled with quality control. Japan has fine-tuned the quality control process in every step of the assembly line. We may think we are winning in a battle of words and promises with Japan, but we are losing on the shop floor. There may be something more to Japan's hesitancy to import American lemons.

The challenge overseas is different from the one confronting our domestic market. The demographics overseas are not the same, the consumers and product needs are much different. Price is the most significant factor when 70 percent of the world's consumers are living in developing countries. The value of the dollar is key, as are our government policies that affect export competitiveness and influence market access.

In sum, U.S. international competitiveness is being challenged on two different fronts. The trade deficit with Japan is symptomatic of a failure by American companies to anticipate the preference for quality and performance of the baby-boom generation. Typical knee-jerk responses to attempt to eliminate or curtail Japanese competition by protecting industries cannot in the long-run succeed in maintaining domestic market shares.

* * * * *

Americans have a tremendous capability to meet any challenge. We have all been raised with a strong competitive streak. Several years ago, Ezra Vogel of Harvard University awakened the boardrooms of America with his book, "Japan: No. 1." We will know that we have reached America's competitiveness goal when we look to our bookshelves and find a copy of the nation's new bestseller. Written by a Japanese professsor, the title will be: "America: No. 1."

ON THE ELECTION OF BISHOP BROWNING

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, September 10, Bishop Edmund Lee Browning, a resident of Hawaii, was elected presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church of the United States. Bishop Browning has long been noted for his courageous and sometimes controversial positions on social and moral issues. His perception of the role of his church in society is worth reflecting upon in this time when some individuals in America have abandoned fundamental principles of tolerance, benevolence and concern for the fundamental rights of all individuals.

Bishop Browning most recently criticized the system of institutionalized oppression and racism in South Africa. His support for the rights of the black majority of that beleaguered nation reflects his deep belief in the equality of mankind in the sight of God. With this motive in mind, his comments on the situation there carry much more credibility than those of U.S. clergymen and others who attempt to rationalize the diabolical inhumanity of apartheid.

Mr. Speaker, Reverend Bishop Browning has devoted his considerable energies to tearing down the barriers that separate the family of man. He has sought and gained common ground among religious groups whose beliefs differ from those of his church. His unwavering faith in the unity of man has given him the strength to address some of the most persistent and difficult questions facing our modern world community.

The new spiritual leader of the almost 3 million Episcopalians in America believes that religious institutions have a responsibility to observe and comment upon social, moral, and political issues. He brings an enlightened approach to this task to his new ministry. I rise to wish him the best in his new duties. His compassion and faith are an inspiration and source of hope in these times of division and uncertainty.

CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM M. THOMAS SALUTES SUNNY SCOFIELD

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker and my fellow Representatives, I would like to take a few moments of your time and bring to your attention the endeavors of a very special woman from my district, Mrs. Sunny Scofield.

Sunny Scofield exemplifies, through her hard work, civic activity, and unselfish devotion of her time many of the virtues we all respect and admire. Winning the Golden Mike Award for her daily television program is only the beginning of a long list of achievements. In addition to her personal achievements, Sunny's community service demonstrates her true devotion to helping spread and promote civic involvement and voluntarism in Kern County.

Sunny has been the driving force behind a special program in Kern County, involving over 1,000 volunteers, to raise over $1 million for charity. She has also played an important role in sponsoring and producing informative television advertisements looking for people willing to help in volunteer programs. These programs include: Volunteers for helping crime victims; Junior Achievement volunteers to help teach young people valuable business skills; Volunteer Tutors to help combat adult illiteracy; and Volunteers to sponsor fine arts programs in Kern County. Sunny has served as the chairperson for Brotherhood Week in Kern County; honorary chairperson for Heart Sunday; and twice chairperson for the March of Dimes Mothers March, to name just a few.

Sunny has shown her community that she cares. Her kind of civic activism is the foundation on which our volunteer programs are built in this country, and I hope that others will learn from her example. Sunny Scofield is not only a pillar in her community, but an important part of the framework of our country, and I feel she deserves the highest praise from this body.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF OCEAN CITY AIRPORT

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to call my colleagues' attention to the 50th anniversary of the Ocean City Airport, which was celebrated on Saturday, September 7, 1985.

The actual history of aviation in Ocean City goes back even beyond 1935. The first flight from the city was also New Jersey's first air mail service. On August 4, 1912, Marshall Reid donned jacket, vest, and tie to operate his biplane for a flight from Ocean City to Stone Harbor. This flight was just 7 years after Orville and Wilbur Wright's historic Kitty Hawk episode which introduced the world to the age of aviation.

The Ocean City Airport, in its present location, is the product of one of President Roosevelt's programs to build up the country's infrastructure during the Depression. Built under the WPA Program, the airport project provided jobs and helped stimulate the economy. Most of south Jersey's airports were built under this program.

Part of what makes the Ocean City Airport so special is its central location. Most airports are built far from the town they serve, while that of Ocean City falls within city limits. Though the airport is largely surrounded by developed property, it has proven a good neighbor and complaints have been minimal.

The airport's 50-year existence has not gone completely uninterrupted. In 1950, political disputes brought about the actual closing of the airport, much to the aviation buffs' dismay. During the same year, however, Ocean City Airport Associates, Inc., was formed. A nonprofit organization founded by Dr. F.B. Lane Haines, its aim was to rally in defense and support of the airport. Without the successful efforts of the group to ensure the existence and operation of the airport, Ocean City would be without one of its finest assets. Ron Reit deserves special commendation for his leadership and commitment throughout the years. He has been involved in the organization since its inception in 1951, and has served as president during his affiliation for a total of nearly 20 years.

This anniversary is a happy occasion because it is a testimony of Ocean City's lasting dedication toward the promotion of aviation. And, as one resident said, the airport "lends class to the community, setting it apart from other similar communities."

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, this week is National Child Safety Week. We have our colleague, Representative LEWIS, to thank for introducing this legislation and guiding it through the Congress.

As legislators, we are all aware of the need to heighten awareness to the problem of inadequate child safety. We must see to it that our constituencies are aware of how they can actively reduce the numbers of children which disappear from their homes every year. Americans must know how to promote child safety and how to look for signs that a child is existing in an unsafe environment.

Although much progress has been made in recent years in bringing the incidence of runaways, abused children, and the problems of child safety generally to the attention of the American public, it is essential that we do everything possible to encourage the growing momentum toward improving the safety of every child in this country.

Again, I commend Representative LEWIS for his introduction of this resolution and I look forward to this week being a productive one in educating the American people in this critical area.

TAKING THE SANDINISTAS AT THEIR WORD

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1985

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on U.S. policy in Central America, a lot of attention has been given to the motives of the Sandinista Government of Nicaragua for spreading revolution in the region. As columnist Georgie Anne Geyer writes, there really should be no debate on the subject at all. All you need to do is read what the Sandinistas themselves have said.

I urge my colleagues to read the recent column by Ms. Geyer which appeared in the August 23 edition of the Wall Street Journal.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 23, 1985]

TAKING THE SANDINISTAS AT THEIR WORD

(By Georgie Anne Geyer)

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.—In August 1979, only weeks after the Sandinistas took over Nicaragua, I was walking through the lobby of the Intercontinental Hotel at about 10 p.m. when I spotted Tomas Borge in an intense huddle with a group of important Latin American diplomats.

Stopping to overhear, I was amazed at what I was clearly hearing—and what the tough Mr. Borge, already minister of the interior, was making no effort to hide.

"Me," he was saying, "I would shoot all the Somocistas. But we won't because we do not want to turn the rest of the Latin American revolution against us. The fewer problems we have, the more Latin America will be attracted to us. The more problems we have, the less."

I stood there listening for two full hours, and the theme was as unmistakable as it was ungarnished. It was that the Nicaraguan revolution was the beginning of "the Latin American revolution." Indeed, that was the phrase that was repeated over and over and over.

Yet more than six years later, the debate over the Sandinistas' intentions still goes on with incongruous intensity. Conservatives in America, led by President Reagan, insist that the Sandinistas are indeed spreading their revolution by subverting their neighbors. Liberals, most notably in Congress, discover that the Sandinistas apparently never actually did use the phrase revolucion sin fronteras, or a "revolution without frontiers," and point to that as proof that the Sandinista revolution is a self-contained if souring one-party state with yearnings to social democracy, if only we gave them the chance.

What is so remarkable about being in this tumultuous isthmus—with El Salvador's increasingly successful democratization and Nicaragua's increasingly Eastern European kind of national silence—is that virtually no one here questions the Sandinistas' efforts and impassioned intent to spread their revolution.

The other Central American leaders simply "know" that there is Sandinista support for their guerrilla movements. "No, there is no doubt that Nicaragua is exporting revolution," El Salvador's Christian Democrat President Jose Napoleon Duarte told me in an interview in May in the Casa Presidencial. "[Nicaraguan President Daniel] Ortega himself said when he took the presidency, 'I'd talk with Duarte, but I'll continue to support the guerrillas.' "

As early as December 1983, Costa Rican President Luis Alberto Monge, a consummate democrat, told me, "In 40 years of Somocismo, we never had the threat that we have in four years of Sandinismo."

Specifically, he was referring to the Sandinistas' internal moves—within the same Costa Rica whose support had been the crucial factor to the success of the Sandinista revolution—to reconstitute the moderate Costa Rica Communist Party as a radical party designed to overthrow the Costa Rican government. Since then, not only have the Sandinistas been attacking across the border, killing two Costa Rican police officers, but an ominous series of kidnappings and robberies in San Jose bear the stamp of the formative years of other kindred guerrilla movements, such as the Salvadoran Farabundo Marti Liberation Front in the early 1970s and the Uruguayan Tupumaros in the late 1960s.

The amount of "proof" as to Sandinista subversion—proof in terms of documents or confessions or intelligence—is massive. On April 18, the Salvadoran military captured several leading guerrillas as well as highly important documents spelling out even more intimate contacts with Nicaragua, Cuba and Eastern Europe than they believed existed. The intelligence on the numbers of international guerrillas and terrorists living in Managua (groups like the lethal Colombian M-19 have virtual compounds here and even groups as obscure as Indian Sikh militants mysteriously but regularly pass through) is substantial.

But these kinds of "proof" are not, to many Americans, really proof. It is difficult, nay impossible, to photograph intent in its historic moment. It is hard for Americans to grasp the inner whispers of social process, usually so apparently motionless. Conspiracy is something compartmentalized in "Casablanca," not in a place as unlikely sounding as Tegucigalpa.

The struggle to figure out what acutally is happening in this once-simple isthmus—which now resembles the Balkans prior to World War I more than anything else—includes an interview with Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez, who earnestly said to me: "This is a democracy." When—if one only studies the structure and the process that have been set up—one sees clearly that it is a totalitarian Marxist structure with all "rights" awarded from above instead of being innate in man, one sees that the process clearly does, and must, move across borders.

The Sandinistas are serious men and women. They have the right to create the kind of state they want; and they have the right to spread revolution, if that is their belief. In the last analysis, one can argue that one should show them the respect of taking them at their word and at their deed—it is somehow patronizing to deny their seriousness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, September 13, 1985

The House met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WRIGHT].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
September 12, 1985.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore on Friday, September 13, 1985.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, the world surrounds us with so much activity and there seems to be so little time to reflect and pray. May the noise and pace and rush of daily events not cause us to miss Your presence and to hear Your still, small voice calling us to faithfulness, friendship, service, and peace. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H.J. Res. 128. Joint resolution designating the month of October 1985 as "National High-Tech Month"; and

H.J. Res. 299. Joint resolution recognizing the accomplishments over the past 50 years resulting from the passage of the Historic Sites Act of 1935, one of this Nation's landmark preservation laws.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. MOLINARI, for 60 minutes, on September 18.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. DREIER of California in one instance.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 3 minutes a.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Tuesday, September 17, 1985, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1995. A letter from the Auditor, District of Columbia, transmitting a report entitled: "Review of Transactions Between the University of the District of Columbia and the Office of the Secretary," pursuant to Public Law 93-198, section 455(d); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1996. A letter from the Auditor, District of Columbia, transmitting a report entitled: "Outstanding Leins Against Samuel C. Jackson Plaza Project Parcels," pursuant to Public Law 93-198, section 455(d); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTED BILLS SEQUENTIALLY REFERRED

Under clause 5 of rule X, bills and reports were delivered to the Clerk for printing, and bills referred as follows:

Mr. DE LA GARZA: Committee on Agriculture. H.R. 2100. A bill to extend and revise agricultural price support and related programs, to provide for agricultural export, resource conservation, farm credit, and agricultural research and related programs, to continue food assistance to low-income persons, to ensure consumers an abundance of food and fiber at reasonable prices, and for other purposes; with an amendment; referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries for a period ending not later than September 18, 1985, for consideration of such portions of the bill and amendment as fall within its jurisdiction pursuant to clause 1(n) of rule X (Rept. 99-271, pt. 1). Ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GONZALEZ:

H.R. 3309. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to provide for improved control of excess profits on negotiated defense contracts; to the Committee on Armed Services.

H.R. 3310. A bill to establish the National Commission for Utilization and Expansion of Language Resources; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H.R. 3311. A bill to establish a program of drug benefits for the aged; to establish a Drug Benefits Council and other appropriate management controls to provide for the efficient administration of such program; and to require the conducting of certain studies and experiments, to enhance the capability of the Secretary of Health and Human Services to administer such program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

H.R. 3312. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to reinstate the deduction for State and local taxes on gasoline and other motor fuels; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII,

Mr. GONZALEZ introduced a bill (H.R. 3313) for the relief of Maria Consuelo Reyna; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL SPONSORS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, sponsors were added to public bills and resolutions as follows:

H.R. 1759: Mr. BERMAN.

H.R. 2954: Mr. FUSTER, Mr. MITCHELL, Ms. MIKULSKI, and Mr. PENNY.

H.R. 3065: Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire.

H.R. 3186: Mr. BROWN of California, Mr. LEHMAN of Florida, and Mr. GEKAS.

SENATE—Friday, September 13, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, September 9, 1985)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

*Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind * * . Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.—Matthew 22:37, 39.

* * * Love is the fulling of the law.—Romans 13:9.

Father in Heaven, there are so many starved for love and affection: children, youth, wives, husbands, parents, neighbors. There are people who never receive a tender, loving touch, a hug, or a gentle word. There are elderly living alone—widows and widowers—who have been shelved, often by their children. They are lonely, forgotten, untouched, starved for love. There are people on the Hill without affection—alone in a crowded office—untouched, unloved, like a robot on the assembly line of office routine. And, Father, despite all the attention they receive—deference wherever they move: press, cameras, lobbyists, constituents, tourists—there are probably Senators who are starved for affection. God of love, at a time when love has been demeaned, degraded, prostituted and reduced to sex, restore true love and its power and feeling, help us to love Thee and one another. Help us not to be afraid to show affection—to express love. In His name, Who is love incarnate. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order the two leaders have 10 minutes each. I reserve the time of myself and also the time of the distinguished minority leader.

That is to be followed by special orders in favor of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] for not to exceed 15 minutes each, followed by routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:45 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1200, the immigration bill. Pending is amendment No. 600, the Hawkins amendment. Rollcall votes can be expected throughout the day's session. It is the intention of the majority leader, and I trust the managers of the bill, to complete action on S. 1200 today.

If that is done, then on Monday, as I have indicated, because of the Jewish holiday, there will be no votes. Votes will be postponed until Tuesday, September 17.

On Monday and Tuesday debate and possibly action on the Superfund legislation, S. 51, hopefully under a time agreement, will be completed, and, if not, will be completed on Wednesday.

Next week we will have before us a number of appropriations bills. I will be conferring with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD. It is my understanding we can expect to take up the HUD appropriations bill, the D.C. appropriations bill, and possibly next week another bill, Senate Joint Resolution 77, the Compact of Free Association. There is some need to dispose of that legislation in a timely fashion. There is a September 30 deadline.

It is also my hope that perhaps the following week we can spend time on farm legislation. Hopefully, we will have a bill out of the Senate Agriculture Committee by then.

We also, of course, have a series of other legislative items we need to address before October 10, which includes extending the debt ceiling and other important legislation.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the immigration bill now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

STAR WARS DID NOT BRING THE SOVIETS BACK TO THE TABLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, again and again in talking with fellow Senators and Wisconsin constituents, I run into one consistent argument in favor of SDI or star wars. It is that the President's announcement of the Star Wars Program and his fervent support for it has brought the Soviets back to the bargaining table in Geneva. That is the prime argument in favor of star wars and it is as empty as a hot-air balloon. What connection is there between star wars and the presence of the Soviets at the bargaining table in Geneva? Consider the facts.

The facts are that the President's announcement of SDI was made 22 months, almost 2 long years before the Soviets came back to the table. Now, the Soviets may be slow to react. But are they that slow? In fact the President's announcement of SDI was made 9 months before they left the table at Geneva. Ponder that for a minute or two. The advent of star wars was 9 months, three-quarters of a year before the Soviets left the bargaining table at Geneva. Would it not seem far more logical to argue that the star wars announcement drove the Soviets away from negotiations than that it brought them into negotiations. Were they any significant technological breakthroughs for star wars before the Soviets returned to Geneva? Of course not. The program has barely begun. Breakthroughs, even tests that might document breakthroughs, are years away.

Mr. President, this Senator does not argue that SDI does not play a role at the Geneva talks. It does indeed. The Soviets have a concern about SDI, a very real concern. They have conceded that SDI research as such cannot be verified and therefore cannot affectively be prevented by a negotiated agreement. But they do want an agreement to stop testing, production and deployment of this antimissile defense. In fact, they have made this a cardinal tenet of any agreement to reduce offensive nuclear weapons. If SDI will not work, why are the Soviets so anxious to negotiate an end to it? A White House statement of January 3, 1985, that spells out our own; that is, the U.S. concern about a Soviet SDI reveals why the Soviets are anxious to negotiate an end to the American SDI. That White House statement declares that the Soviet Union could break out of the ABM Treaty and develop a nationwide ABM system in the next 10 years, and continues: "Were they to do so, as they could, deterrence would collapse and we should have no choices between surrender and suicide."

Let me repeat that. The White House said:

Were they to do so, as they could, deterrence would collapse and we should have no choices between surrender and suicide.

Let us take a look in the mirror. That statement drew an interesting picture of the United States psychological reaction to the remote possibility that the Soviets might, just might, sometime develop their own SDI. Is it not logical to expect that the Soviets might suffer the same vision of the collapse of their deterrence and their confrontation with the choice of surrender or suicide? Why not?

Of course, the White House statement is a gross overstatement of the potential threat of a Soviet SDI. The Soviets have a similar gross overestimate of the possibility of an American SDI. Neither side can or will achieve the technological miracle. Either could go broke trying to do so. Meanwhile, the uncertainty and instability, the nightmare threat continues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article entitled "Star Wars: Europe's Polite Waffle," by Wayland Kennet, a former British minister and member of the House of Lords, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STAR WARS: EUROPE'S POLITE WAFFLE

(By Wayland Kennet)

Careful reactions in Western Europe to President Reagan's March 1983 "Star Wars" speech began late; there were few in the first year. The idea seemed farfetched; the president had often before been rescued by his staff from off-the-cuff remarks.

At the official level reactions are still not settled, and it is impossible to say what they will be. It would be laborious to catalogue in detail the present official positions: the catalogue would demonstrate, above all, waffle. When governments waffle, other friendly governments should know without being told that they mean: "We don't like and are embarrassed by your idea, but we don't want to say so too loud or too clear." That is what the European NATO governments are saying to the U.S. administration about the Strategic Defense Initiative—except the French who, as usual, have said exactly what they think.

The Reagan Administration, especially the Pentagon, misinterpreted the polite waffle and has gone on to mistake the reasons for which European governments are against SDI, believing that Europeans are worried about not being protected by SDI and that short-range missile defenses will therefore make them quite happy again, or that all Europe wants is a good helping of gravy from the train. This is a false or at least very partial understanding.

The general European attitude is summed up in the four points agreed upon by President Reagan and Prime Minister Thatcher at Camp David a few days before Christmas last year:

"The United States and Western aim is not to achieve superiority, but to maintain balance, taking account of Soviet developments.

"SDI-related deployment would, in view of treaty obligations, have to be a matter for negotiations.

"The overall aim is to enhance, and not to undermine deterrence.

"East/West negotiations should aim to achieve security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides. This will be the purpose of the resumed United States/Soviet negotiations on arms control."

These four points have been accepted de facto by all of European NATO as guidelines for further action. They will not be forgotten; any statement that contradicts them will weaken the Alliance, and any action that infringes them will destroy it.

In these points there is no mention of the present research phase, let alone of any support for it. Europeans may support it in the sense of agreeing that it is allowed by the ABM Treaty and that some response to Soviet research is prudent. But such support will only mean governments will refrain from forbidding firms and laboratories from bidding for U.S.-funded contracts.

It would in any case be a mistake to attribute much importance to these attitudes to the research phase. Europeans are inclined to ask one preliminary question about the SDI: what is our opinion about the end to be served by the means which we are invited to help develop? Not only can the end not justify the means, but the means cannot justify the end, and thus should not be allowed to define it. For if the end is wrong, or not known, then the means are also wrong. There is no point in researching how to do something one ought not to do, or which one cannot describe.

Informed political circles in Britain have been skeptical since learning, sometime in April 1983, that President Reagan's SDI speech had been made before consulting his defense secretary or the Joint Chiefs of Staff. We know this because very senior British defense officials were briefed by very senior U.S. defense officials the day before the speech about its contents, and SDI was not part of it.

There is no military demand for SDI in Europe, and before the president spoke there was no military demand for it in the United States. Nor has any military demand for it been made clear since, though some military men are seen to be obeying their commander in chief's orders. We are entirely against the acquisition of arms for which there is no military demand, and one wonders whether the industrial-bureaucratic complex may be becoming even more dangerous than the military-industrial one.

So there have been in Europe embarrassment, concern not to rock the NATO boat and not to make the negotiations in Geneva more difficult, unwillingness to see scarce money for military budgets sidetracked into fantasies, even a feeling not unlike the despondency with which we watched the United States in Vietnam, fighting a war that by definition could not be won. This was a difficult mixture of perceptions to digest.

To our relief, the Reagan-Thatcher four points were identifiably present in the Shultz-Gromyko joint statement of January 8. But then those in the Administration and the Geneva delegations who were attached to the full vision of SDI began to eat Shultz's words—and indeed the president's—and hopes sank.

On March 15 Sir Geoffrey Howe, the British foreign secretary, made a long and careful speech—at the Royal United Services Institute—setting out 15 questions and statements about SDI which the British government believed should be answered as soon as possible, well before the industrial and employment momentum in the United States built up. His 15 points are now as central to European opinion as Prime Minister Thatcher's four points. Each of them can be answered in several ways, but the following answers would probably not provoke very much dissent among informed West Europeans unconnected with the arms industry.

Could the process of moving towards a greater emphasis on active defenses be managed without generating dangerous uncertainty?

No. Imagine the months when one country is drawing toward the completion of an impermeable ABM system. Once it is achieved, it will be able to launch a first strike with impunity. The incitement to its opponent to launch a preemptive first strike at an optimum moment is much increased. The thought that both sides might reach that moment at the same time, thereby removing the incitement to the slower side to consider a preemptive first strike, is politically absurd. Such a simultaneity could only be arranged through detailed and trusting cooperation, which, if it existed, would be better put to achieving disarmament.

Would the establishment of limited defenses increase the threat to civilian populations by stimulating a return to the targeting policies of the 1950s?

Yes. As the number of ICBMs which each side felt sure would get through become lower, each side would have no choice but to rely more and more on countervalue retaliation. Perhaps there is no obvious reason why such a return should be thought a bad thing; the peace was kept in the 1950s by countervalue deterrence as well as in the 1970s by "flexible response." However that may be, the building of an impermeable ICBM shield would produce, late in this history, a balance analogous to that of the 1950s, and which could be produced now by simply reducing the number of ICBMs held by each side.

Would SDI weaponry be "survivable and cost-effective"?

It could possibly be survivable but only until the counterweapons catch up. We are only dealing with another bit of the arms race. And, as already noted, the cost-effective way to keep ICBMs from getting through is to reduce the number of ICBMs in existence.

What would be its psychological impact on the other side?

President Reagan answered this in the least-quoted part of his March 1983 speech: "I clearly realize that defensive systems have limitations and ambiguities. If paired with offensive systems they can be viewed as fostering an aggressive policy." Both superpowers are indeed currently engaged in massive development of offensive strategic weapons; the United States is developing six such systems.

This same point was made with even greater force in a White House statement of January 3, 1985. It states that the Soviet Union could break out of the ABM Treaty and develop a nationwide ABM system in the next 10 years, and continues: "Were they to do so, as they could, deterrence would collapse and we should have no choices between surrender and suicide."

This is a very adequate account of the "psychological effect on the other side" from the point of view of an American imagining what an effective Soviet SDI would be like. It is strange how seldom such persons understand that the fear they might feel in the future is the fear the Soviets feel now. This argument is well understood by West Europeans who note—as no doubt the U.S. Administration does—that this is in fact the main argument used by the Soviets. This does not by definition make it a bad argument.

What are the chances that there would be no outright winner in the everlasting marathon of the arms race?

Overwhelmingly high. In the mid-1960s the Soviets were all for ABM defenses to cover their whole country, since it was a moral duty to defend one's people. At that time the United States went to great pains to persuade the Soviet Union that major area BMD would be destabilizing, alarming, and so forth. The effort at persuasion succeeded, and the Soviet Union is now playing the U.S. arguments of those days back to their originators. It is like a chess tournament in which the players change colors after each game.

But a wider section of world opinion is watching the match than 20 years ago, so it seems more likely the argument will come to rest, with the Soviets declaring that they would increase the penetration ability of their ICBMs as U.S. defenses built up. These statements give advance warning of a knight's move—the normal Soviet response; the castle and queen move would be to step up ICBM numbers. If President Reagan later breaks the SALT II restrictions, the Soviets will no doubt do that as well: in the arms race, no one is limited to one move at a time.

On this point, European public opinion is well-developed. No less than 84 percent of the British electorate believe that if the United States develops Star Wars the Soviets will follow suit—meaning a continuing arms race. Moreover, 84 percent also believe that the United States will develop Star Wars, whatever the NATO allies say.

How would protection be extended against the non-ballistic missile nuclear threat . . . aircraft, cruise missiles, battlefield nuclear weapons . . . covert action?

Although the presidential slogan remains "to render nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete," there have been no new proposals for defenses against any delivery systems except medium and long-range ballistic ones. If anything more were done, the system would cost even more. As proposed, the system will remain quite incapable of rendering nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete. Locking only one door of the house will not greatly inconvenience the keen burglar.

If it initially proves feasible to construct only limited defenses . . . would the holes in the dike . . . encourage a nuclear flood?

A major but limited system would encourage an increase in nuclear delivery systems and improvement of their penetration ability. Human nature says, "If you can shoot down two out of three, then I must have three times as many to be safe as I was."

Might it not be better to "protect key military installations" by increasing mobility and by submarine deployment?

Yes. It would be cheaper.

Might we find ourselves in a situation where the peace of the world rested solely upon computers and automatic decision-making?

Obviously so. All accounts agree that the earlier in an incoming missile's trajectory an intercept is attempted, the more it must be automatically controlled. The thought of human frailty is alarming, of electronic frailty even more so. But the thought of preprogramed boost-phase intercepts over Soviet territory (or vice versa) is absolutely terrifying.

A question of international law is concealed in this escalation of political terror. At what point in the trajectory of a ballistic missile rising from the territory or a submarine of one country does its intended destination become apparent to its opponent's computers? Not very early, and therefore the SDI envisages that the intercepts should commence before the intended designation is known: if all missiles whatsoever rising from the soil or submarines of the attacking country can be intercepted immediately, the opponent country's programming would be greatly simplified. But the political and strategic effect would be the same as that of destroying missiles on the ground. This ability puts the intended target-country willy-nilly into a first-strike, counterforce posture; and the effect on the originally attacking country can only be like that of a first-strike, counterforce posture as traditionally conceived. To give the impression of aiming to acquire a first-strike, counterforce capability has been considered a bad plan since the Soviet Union interpreted U.S. Defense Secretary Robert McNamara's doctrines that way in 1961 and 1962. That led directly to the Soviets' attempt to place intermediate-range ballistic missiles in Cuba: the last great superpower confrontation.

We shall have to ask ourselves not only whether the West can afford to have active defenses against nuclear missiles. We must also ask whether the enormous funds to be devoted to such systems might be better employed.

The opportunity cost of the arms race has long been one of the main arguments for ending it. The argument in the case of SDI is the same as usual, but the cost in question is greater than usual.

What would be the effect on all the other elements of our defenses, on which Western security will continue in large part to depend?

Either SDI would draw away a lot of money from existing defense arrangements, or the West would spend a lot more money on defense. Both alternatives are profoundly unwelcome to Europeans, who want to keep conventional defense up, as well as to do more to help poorer countries. "Enough is enough" is the view of European electorates.

Could . . . the vision of effective defenses over the horizon provide new incentives to both sides to start at once on reducing their present levels [of nuclear arms]?

Yes, certainly; the vision of each successive upward turn in the arms race could and should have stopped the arms race when it first began. (The fact that successive visions have not stopped it should now be the central concern of political philosophy.) That is true of the possibility, posed in the abstract. But actual threats never bring on cooperation between the threatener and the threatened.

The use of the words "start at once" reminds us of the claim now being made that the threat of SDI brought the Soviets back to the table in Geneva. It might, or it might not have; we shall not know for some time, if ever. To believe it did is to believe the reaction time in Moscow is even slower than we thought. The president's announcement of SDI was made 22 months before the Soviets came back to the table; it was actually made nine months before they even left it.

We should have to be sure the formidable task could actually be managed on a . . . basis [acceptable to both the United States and the Soviet Union].

Since the United States is richer and bears waste more easily than the Soviet Union, the latter consider higher arms levels automatically threatening. The dream of detente at high arms levels is glaringly incompatible with another dream even now to be found in some corners in Washington: that of spending the Soviet Union into the ground. It is certain that if mutual acceptability of strategic postures can be achieved at all it will be at a lower, not a higher, level of armaments.

Sir Geoffrey made this point in the course of saying how important it is that no one should break the ABM Treaty, and in this he speaks for European NATO as a whole. That treaty and SALT I are the only de jure agreements between the superpowers which do something toward meeting their obligations to the rest of the world under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. It is true that the ABM Treaty is only a piece of paper, and that it can be legally denounced with due warning. But the same applies to the North Atlantic Treaty. West European opinion is already aghast at the Reagan Administration's handling of Nicaragua: the mining of the ports, the flouting of the World Court, the charge that Irish terrorists get support from Nicaragua, and so forth. It is unlikely that the Alliance would survive a U.S. rupture of the ABM Treaty.

We must be sure that the United States guarantee to Europe would indeed be enhanced as a result of defensive deployments. Not only enhanced at the end of the process, but from its very inception.

There is of course no written U.S. guarantee to Europe that one can turn to and ask whether the force of these words would be strengthened or weakened by the proposed course of action. The guarantee is implicit in the presence of U.S. ground forces in Europe, and in the pattern of deployment of U.S. intermediate-range nuclear systems and naval forces.

The argument about whether SDI would make it more or less likely that these conventional and nuclear deployments would remain intact seems closely balanced at the moment. Some say that if SDI worked, the United States would be emboldened to be yet more protective towards Europe than now. Others say the United States would profit by the increased protection it enjoyed to give rein to the tendency, which is always present, to reduce or withdraw its European commitments. The minority which oposes NATO says, as it has said before, that the United States would be able to contemplate limited war in Europe with impunity.

Which assessment is true depends on who the American people elect, and this uncertainty is the price of democracy. Twice this century the United States, Britain, and France have together celebrated victory in world wars of European origin. But in both, Europe had to wait for U.S. assistance until the United States itself was attacked. The first time the British fought alongside France and Italy for two years, the second time quite alone for three years.

These memories are seldom mentioned, because of our self-destructive politeness.

But they are real. We do not, however, demand greater predictability of the United States because of them; we are ourselves unpredictable in our relations with our friends who are weaker, and we would certainly sooner have an unpredictable democracy on our side than a predictable tyranny.

In terms of NATO's policy of forward defense and flexible response, would we lose on the swings whatever might be gained on the roundabouts?

In other words: If the U.S. military presence in and on behalf of Europe were enfeebled, whether by the cost of SDI or by the United States lightening the political and financial burden of its European commitment, would the Soviet Union procure and deploy weapons in such a way as to threaten Europe selectively, and thus blackmail NATO as a whole?

Knowing the Soviet Union from closer than the United States, Europeans must answer yes. We certainly think that the Soviet Union would find it impossible to resist the temptation to increase its ability to browbeat and blackmail Europe.

The wrong way to prevent this happening would be for the United States to press on with SDI while the Europeans made up for the reduced U.S. strength in Europe by new procurements and deployments of their own. That would cost us all even more and mean even more weapons on the face of the earth, as well as in space. The right way would be disarmament.

Instead of helping to answer Sir Geoffrey Howe's questions about the desirability of SDI, U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger asked European NATO governments to tell him within 60 days how they proposed to join the research.

The reactions to this request have ranged from the outright French rejection accompanied by a counterproposal, the "Eureka" program, to the German attitude of timid hankering. Britain is between the two. (Reports in the United States that Thatcher favors strategic defenses are mistaken). Norway is pretty much with Britain, tending towards France. The Danish parliament has instructed its government to have nothing to do with it. Italy has suggested that the United States start talking to the Soviet Union right away about where research becomes development. Outside Europe, Japan is close to Germany, Australia is close to France, and of course New Zealand, being in disgrace with the United States, has not been invited at all.

The invitation to Israel presents a special problem, since Israel's repeated flouting of U.N. resolutions and continued illegal occupation of foreign territory, despite European, and indeed U.S. pleas, makes any military association impossible for us. Like Nicaragua, this is a general problem of European-U.S. relations.

The debate on how to answer Weinberger's request (the 60-day ultimatum was withdrawn) is a difficult one. If anyone wants to develop rapid advances in computers, parallel processing, sensors, directed energy beams, cryogenics, and so forth, the cost-effective way to do it is directly, not as a by-product of a military procurement for which there has been no military demand. We clearly reject the proposition that any military activity can properly be undertaken for the civil spinoff it may yield.

It is precisely because of this feeling that France has proposed the Eureka research program, and Britain and Germany have agreed to join in. It would be European and civilian, and would deal with many of the same technologies as SDI. The possibilities of fruitful interfacing with SDI are obvious.

Although the history of European attempts at joint programs in applied research is not encouraging, there have been successes in pure research, particularly CERN (European Center for Nuclear Research). Every opportunity to overcome past shortsightedness must be welcomed.

The SDI crisis could become, if it is not already, the worst in NATO's history. In some ways it resembles the multilateral force crisis of the mid-1960s. That was shortlived, and the waves of ardent U.S. missionaries soon ceased trying to explain our own interests to us. This one has gone on longer already, and the missionaries show no sign of tiring. NATO itself is at stake, and two views of NATO have never been more sharply and dangerously in contrast; the naive view of NATO as a collection of countries with one single interest, equal and equally intense to all, and the realistic view which sees it as a collection of countries with overlapping but distinguishable interests which must be respected and reconciled. We know SDI would be terribly damaging to our interests, and we doubt that anyone can identify our interests better than we can. There is a widespread European opinion that it would also be damaging to U.S. interests, but we do not think we can identify those better than the United States can.

SDI concerns all the world and raises questions which are only now being identified. They are far from being answered in a way which could preserve NATO's unity. The answers, when they do come, will have to reflect the fact that SDI and disarmament are world concerns.

MYTH OF THE DAY: THAT FEDERAL BORROWING IS GOOD FOR THE ECONOMY AND TAXES ARE BAD

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, some administration officials, blinking at a $2 trillion national debt, are arguing that it is better to borrow than to increase taxes. They believe that raising taxes will retard economic growth while borrowing is neutral.

What a myth! This myth cannot be supported on economic or political grounds. It is a smokescreen, intended to obscure the uncomfortable fact that the national debt has doubled in 5 short years.

Look first at economics. What causes economic growth? That happy situation takes place when we bring new resources into use or when we make more effective use of those already available or some combination of both.

But if taxes are used to improve the technical capabilities of the American worker, that improves one of the fundamental underpinnings of growth. Such taxes would be pro-growth, not anti. The same argument would hold for borrowed money.

What counts then is not so much where the money comes from but how it is used. How has this administration used the enormous sums it has borrowed? It has used this money for two of the least productive types of Government spending—armaments and interest payments.

Somewhere in the neighborhood of 60 percent of the increased debt is directly attributable to the defense buildup and to the costs of carrying the additional debt. Sure, there are some technological spinoffs from defense work, but when compared to the money spent, the productive aspects are negligible. Interest payments do nothing to improve productivity but merely postpone the day of reckoning.

On political grounds, increased taxes are going to be a part of any package which really reduces the deficit. It is so large that even the administration cannot make more than a dent in it by recommending spending cuts. If the taxes imposed come from the right sources, from closing nonproductive loopholes, for example, then we could actually improve the prospects for growth by raising revenue.

To assert that taxes are antigrowth, while borrowing is somehow less dangerous, is myth making at the level of Aesop. Real antigrowth policies take money from productive uses, whether public or private, and put it to nonproductive use. At doing that, this administration is the champion.

TEMPTATION OF MADNESS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently at the annual meeting of the American Psychiatric Association, Holocaust survivor and noted author Elie Wiesel described his experiences during the Holocaust and said he is trying to determine whether elements of madness exist today similar to those that existed during World War II.

Wiesel delivered his lecture to the American Psychiatric Association on the theme, "Temptation of Madness." Wiesel told the psychiatrists in the audience that he needed them to explain to him how so many people who suffered through the horrors of Nazi concentration camps could keep their sanity in the midst of the madness around them.

Wiesel noted, "Perhaps we discovered that to deny the present we could seek our refuge in the past."

Wiesel's intention in giving the speech was to link his past experiences with the present and warn that the type of madness that characterized events in World War II could arise again.

Wiesel emphasized that there are 41 wars now being waged around the world. He wondered to his audience if humanity is again giving in to the temptation of madness that took over during World War II.

History has shown that such madness surfaces periodically, Wiesel said, and he hoped that with the nuclear threat facing the planet today, this madness was not about to resurface.

The madness that Wiesel so fears is not as removed from today's world as we would like to think. Wiesel cautioned, "The real enemy is not evil, like some believe, but indifference." It is this indifference that we must always guard against.

Mr. President, the warning of Elie Wiesel is timeless. History, indeed, has a pattern of repeating itself. Indifference to acts of genocide only increases the likelihood that the horrors of the Holocaust will be repeated.

The United States should act swiftly to ratify the Genocide Convention and ensure that the attitude of indifference that Mr. Wiesel rightly fears is never again allowed to develop. A strong international commitment to prevent and punish acts of genocide would guard against the threat of indifference.

Mr. President, the strong international commitment is there. The United States needs only to ratify the Genocide Convention to show that it stands firmly opposed to the type of brutality perpetrated in the Holocaust and that it is committed to prevent it from ever happening again.

Mr. President, I think we should recognize that the Senate, by an overwhelming vote late last year, pledged itself to take up the Genocide Convention early in the 99th Congress. We are no longer early in the 99th Congress. We have not taken it up. It has been recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 10 to 1. The leadership enthusiastically favors it. The President of the United States favors it. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the time to act on the Genocide Convention is certainly here.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MOYNIHAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

DEFECTION OF KGB AGENT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in this morning's press we learn that the chief of the KGB station in London, a Mr. Oleg A. Gordievski, has defected to the British and has been granted asylum.

In consequence of his early conversations with British authorities, the Government there has ordered the explusion of 25 Soviet nationals from the United Kingdom on grounds of espionage.

Mr. David Goodall, a civil servant at the Foreign Office, is reported to have told the acting Soviet chargé d'affaires that "the nature and scale" of Soviet intelligence activities was "completely unacceptable." Thus the expulsions.

Mr. Goodall's statement reflects a realistic assessment that there is going to be a certain amount of intelligence activities by any embassy in any country. But when these activities shade over into espionage, and into the violation of law of the host country, the individuals involved become criminals. While diplomatic immunity prevents the prosecution of some of the persons involved, elemental national self-respect, and concern for the rights of citizens against whom such crimes are directed, requires the expulsion of these persons. The British have not hesitated to do this before and they have this week done it again.

With what contrast, Mr. President, we observe the behavior of our own Government with respect to Soviet espionage in this country.

Ten years ago, Vice President Nelson Rockefeller headed a Presidential Commission of Inquiry into the activities of the Central Intelligence Agency directed against—it was alleged—Americans. That Commission, established by President Ford, included among its members the man who is now President, Ronald Reagan.

Among the findings of the Commission which were published in June 1975, was an extraordinary revelation. The Rockefeller Commission determined that the Soviet Union had begun on a massive systematic basis to intercept telephone conversations in and about the New York City area—this from facilities provided them for use of their mission to the United Nations.

About the time the report was issued, I was nominated by President Ford to be the U.S. Permanent Representative at the United Nations. Vice President Rockefeller went out of his way then to see that I called on him in order to tell me, as a matter of great urgency, that I must understand that anything I would say on the telephone from the U.S. Mission on U.N. Plaza or the U.S. residence on the 42d floor of the Waldorf Towers would be listened to by the Soviet Union, by the KGB.

I took that matter with great seriousness; and I took it with great seriousness when, in December 1975, Mr. Arkady Shevchenko, the Deputy Secretary General of the United Nations for Political Affairs, and the highest ranking Soviet in the U.N. system, indicated his interest in defecting to the United States. In matters involving Shevchenko, I was at pains never to say a word on any of our telephones—as a matter of fact, on any telephone whatever—and confined myself very much to personal exchanges—mouth to mouth, you might say—in places where the possibility of being overheard was minimal. Madison Square Garden, incidentally, turned out to be an excellent place.

The reports from London today state that the defection of Mr. Oleg Gordievski is the most important defection since that of Shevchenko 10 years ago.

Mr. Shevchenko has since published a memoir, earlier this year, in which he discusses the events that led to his defection, the highest level Soviet defection in the history of the Soviet Union. Mr. Shevchenko was on anyone's short list of someone who might succeed Mr. Gromyko one day. He was a protege of Mr. Gromyko.

In "Breaking With Moscow," Mr. Shevchenko described how he would go out to Glen Cove, Long Island, in Nassau County, to Killingworth, a kind of summer estate that the Soviets own there—it is sensible to get out of Manhattan on occasion—and find that the attics and garages were stuffed with telephone interception equipment.

The Soviets later built a 22-story building in the Riverdale section of the Bronx, which, it turns out, is just a communications tower. They intercept and record the microwave telephone conversations that pass through in New York City. They do the same on 16th Street here in Washington, four blocks from the White House, in their Embassy, which happened to be the czarist embassy. If any Members of this body would like to see what they do on 16th Street, it is not hard, though one should hurry, however, because they will not be there long. For now, one could go up on the roof of the Washington Post building on 15th Street and look down at the array of atennae and telephone boxes and so on. You also find them in San Francisco atop their consulate there, which sits on a very high point in San Francisco.

Here in the Capital, the Soviets will soon move to Mount Alto, the highest point in Washington, where they have built a large new embassy, which will be one of the most important communications facilities in our country. From there, the Soviets will be listening in to every conversation that can be intercepted in their line of sight, and the line of sight includes the State Department, the Capitol, and U.S. Senate office buildings.

And we allow this. No Soviets are expelled, as the British were so quick to expell 25 Russians home yesterday.

We not only allow their espionage to continue; in a certain sense, we encourage it by letting the Soviets know that we know they are doing it and that we will not do anything about it.

This not only encourages the Soviets, but it encourages in them I expect a measure of contempt for us, contempt you can feel when you talk to people who deal with these matters. When a Soviet Embassy spokesman was asked recently by the Washington Post, "What is this business of your taking Mt. Alto and all the things we hear," he replied, rather nicely, I thought, "You know, we didn't capture the site; we were given it."

When I came down to the Senate in 1977, at the start of President Carter's term, I introduced legislation saying that the President, if he has reason to believe that diplomats of foreign nations are engaged in illegal activities such as telephone interception, should ask them to stop. If they do not stop, he should declare them persona non grata and expel them. Mr. Carter would not do that. And I could not even get a hearing in the House and Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

When Mr. Reagan came in, in 1981, I introduced the legislation again. Again, the new administration opposed this.

In January of this year, at the start of Mr. Reagan's second term, I introduced the measure again, as S. 12. The State Department opposed enactment.

There is a very ominous quality to the opposition. Under the Carter administration, the Government began burying its telephone lines to defense contractors and people like that, and said, "We are going to defend the Government." But the public—well, somehow, that is different. They'll have to look out for themselves. Once in a hearing in the Select Committee on Intelligence when I was presiding, I asked the general counsel of the CIA, "Sir, is this activity going on?"

"Obviously, it is going on," he said.

I asked, "Does that not involve a violation of the fourth amendment rights of American citizens?"

"No," he said.

"No," I said, "How so?"

He said, "The fourth amendment only protects you against intrusions on your privacy by your own Government, not by the Soviet Government."

It led me to believe that gentleman went to slightly too good a law school.

In June, I offered the language of S. 12 as a floor amendment to the State Department authorization bill. Our distinguished chairman, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR] and his not less distinguished and learned colleague, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL], accepted this measure. There was no objection expressed to it. The bill went to conference where representatives of the Department of State and—well, I will just leave it at the Department of State—informed the conferees that it was the desire of the administration that this amendment be dropped, stating that it involves some unspecified risks to the Nation.

Now the language of the amendment, like S. 12 itself, states specifically that the President ought not expel foreign diplomats engaged in electronic eavesdropping if there are any national security reasons. If he does not want to do it, he just does not have to do it. The purpose and the language of the amendment is to indicate that the U.S. Senate thinks the fourth amendment rights of American citizens are violated by the Soviet Union when it listens, no less than they would be by the American Government when it listens.

It is explicitly illegal for the U.S. Government to involve itself in this sort of activity. But when it comes to the Soviet Government, well, the conferees just dropped the matter.

Yesterday's New York Daily News, the largest circulation newspaper in our country, and possessing one of the finest editorial pages, of great thoughtfulness and interest and reliability, ran an editorial which I should like to read into the RECORD. If I have a moment, Mr. President, I am going to read it, not ask that it be printed.

The editorial is entitled "It's for You, Ivan."

Are Russian agents listening in on your phonecalls? That's neither a joke nor a paranoid fantasy.

Then it says, as I have pointed out, that the Soviets have a batch of buildings on 67th Street in Manhattan, in Glen Cove and in the Bronx.

Their dishes can suck microwave phone transmissions right out of the air.

Federal agencies have guaranteed the confidentially of their conversations by buying more than $6 billion worth of secure phones—a single unit can go as high as $35,000. Ordinary folks have no such protection. That's why Moynihan is ringing alarm bells.

One issue is the invasion of privacy. If U.S. agents were wiretapping indiscriminately, there'd be a national hullabaloo. Little heads would roll. Yet no one in the State Department or Congress—with the exception of New York's Moynihan—gives a hoot when Soviet spies violate a highly prized constitutional right.

The other issue is national security. There's ample evidence the Russians eavesdrop on Wall Street financial and banking traffic, gathering information that could be used to hurt this nation. They also can listen to personal calls—a client confiding in his lawyer, an executive arranging a love affair—that can be used to blackmail.

Mr. President, we recently learned that our President, our greatly respected President, has issued an Executive order ordering that the car telephones used by high Government executives in this town be protected against eavesdropping by the Soviet.

Concern about this threat to Americans' civil liberties grows. An official of the National Security Agency, Mr. Walter G. Deeley, has raised it publicly. Let me say in 8 years on the Intelligence Committee, I do not remember a public statement of any sort from the NSA nor had we ever any sense that material was being given to the press from the NSA.

Mr. Walter G. Deeley said we are compromising the security of this country. He said we are going to need 500,000 phones at $35,000 each that are "user friendly." But, he said, that is not the point. The point is we are letting the Soviets invade the privacy and the confidentiality of the whole of society. And we do nothing about it.

Mr. President, I do not know where we go from here. I do not know what the world thinks about us. The British throw people out of their country for violating their rules. We will not.

I would like to remind the President, if I may, of the findings of the Commission headed by Vice President Rockefeller, that Mr. Reagan was involved in. The Commission was very clear on the point that possibilities of blackmail that are developing from Soviet espionage are real and immediate and must be attended to.

Ten years have gone by. We have done nothing. To the contrary, the biggest installation of all is about to begin on Mount Alto.

There is, I believe, an explanation why we do nothing. I don't know yet what the reasons are, but it requires an explanation. Blackmail may be one. Pusillanimous dispositions may be another. I ask, Mr. President, are we afraid of these people? Do we dare not tell them to stop? Is there any other reason?

We hear from the highest levels of our Government talk about Evil Empire, spy dust, we will show you.

Well, why do we not just tell Soviet agents in this country to stop violating the laws of the United States, including the Constitution thereof? Just stop.

If they do not, why do we not just tell them to get out, and tell them also to get their KGB agents out of the U.N. Secretariat in New York?

When Shevchenko came over a decade ago we picked up the names of all manner of KGB agents and activities in the U.N. Secretariat that were in clear violation of article 100, section 2 of the U.N. Charter which expressly forbids any member government giving directions to a national of that government who happens to be employed in the Secretariat.

Yet the KGB is all over the place. Mr. Shevchenko names them in his book. When they found out those names, once Mr. Shevchenko came, and the fact that he was involved with us became public, the Carter administration expelled them.

Margaret Thatcher is not afraid to do that. Nor was Edward Heath.

We are. We are beginning to behave like a nation that is afraid of our adversaries, afraid even to insist upon the elemental constitutional rights of Americans in this country.

Nelson Rockefeller 10 years ago told us the Soviets were listening in on our telephone conversations, and that it has taken place at a level increased beyond any imagination. At that time, they had not opened their 22-story communications tower in Riverdale in the Bronx and at that point they had been given but certainly did not yet have Mount Alto where the new Embassy is going to be.

Today they do. And we do not dare say, "Stop it."

The British, on the other hand, do seem to mind, and the Soviets do not seem to be surprised. If a KGB station chief defects and gives out the names of people involved in illegal activity, and the British expel them, the Soviets do not say, "You can't do that." They got caught. They smile and chuckle, and off they go back to Moscow for a few weeks leave and another new assignment. It is part of their business.

Imagine the contempt on their part when they observe our administration shaking its fist in the face of communism—everywhere save in the People's Republic of China, where communism in apparently considered by our Government to be of a benign nature—while supinely submitting to the subversion of the integrity of the American telephone system by the Soviet Embassy itself.

Mr. President, this Senate and this Congress now, bears a measure of responsibility for complicity in this submission.

We adopted on this floor the measure, S. 12, that I introduced in January. It was taken to conference, and we dropped it.

Are we saying that we are afraid of the Soviets also? I put it this way: I mean, not just afraid of the scandal, the noise, the difficulty, the bad measure. The British with Margaret Thatcher did not hesitate to throw them out for less.

Is it possible that Nelson Rockefeller's forecast of blackmail is showing its effects here in Washington?

Remember, Mr. President, your telephone calls are listened to. Mine are. The distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] who knows a very great deal about this matter is here on the floor. Most especially his telephone calls are monitored because they are more interesting—having to do with the future of American politics—than certainly those of this grayed Senator from New York.

Do we have a Government that distinguishes between itself and its people, that protects itself but does not care about its people?

I hope not, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the editorial from the Daily News, entitled "It's For You, Ivan."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily News, Sept. 12, 1985]

IT'S FOR YOU, IVAN

Are Russian agents listening in on your phone calls? That's neither a joke nor a paranoid fantasy. Sen. Pat Moynihan points out that the Soviets have a batch of strategically located buildings—their UN mission on E. 67th St., a compound in Glen Cove, L.I., a tower on high ground in the Bronx, their embassy on a hill in Washington, D.C.—bristling with electronic gear. Their dishes can suck microwave phone transmissions right out of the air.

Federal agencies have guaranteed the confidentially of their conversations by buying more than $6 billion worth of secure phones—a single unit can go as high as $35,000. Ordinary folks have no such protection. That's why Moynihan is ringing alarm bells.

One issue is the invasion of privacy. If U.S. agents were wiretapping indiscriminately, there'd be a national hullabaloo. Little heads would roll. Yet no one in the State Department or Congress—with the exception of New York's Moynihan—gives a hoot when Soviet spies violate a highly prized constitutional right.

The other issue is national security. There's ample evidence the Russians eavesdrop on Wall Street financial and banking traffic, gathering information that could be used to hurt this nation. They also can listen to personal calls—a client confiding in his lawyer, an executive arranging a love affair—that can be used to blackmail.

Moynihan is pushing a measure allowing the feds to expose and deport foreign agents—even those with diplomatic immunity—caught at electronic surveillance. The administration rejects the bill, saying it already has the power. If so, why isn't it using it? The Reagan administration should wake up to what is potentially a serious threat to American.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. HART. That is if the time situation permits.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from New York on his, as usual, informative and provocative statement.

I was interested in observing in the press in the last 48 hours, comments on the bill that he was here today remarking upon and the defense of the administration to its failure to support, and resistance of this legislation was that it would give away vital secrets—I think "sources and methods" is the catch phrase.

Without getting into those sources and methods, I would be interested in the response of the Senator from New York to that allegation that we cannot as a government adopt the program that the Senator from New York has been advocating because to do so, to shut down an illegal interference, would give away the methods by which we do so. Is that correct?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Let me tell the whole of the Senate to listen to one of these sources and methods. You can go up to the roof of the Washington Post building and you can look down at the interceptors on the top of the Soviet Embassy.

I revealed a secret perhaps, but I do not know the world was not ready for it.

An agent, a named officer of the FBI, has said that 40 percent of the Soviet Embassy personnel in Washington are involved in interception of telephone conversations. The FBI knows. They do not reveal that sort of thing to the press casually. They know who they are.

It is the same way, I am sorry to say, if you look at a biography of any individual in an embassy, ours or others, you know who the intelligence people are and you know who the technical people are. It is not that hard. We know.

We know and do not dare say. Or we do not dare say that we do not know. Either way it does not speak well of us.

There are constitutional rights of American citizens involved here. We do not take an oath when we come into this body to maintain wheat prices or see that mass transit moneys are appropriated, or whatnot. We take an oath to defend and uphold the Constitution of the United States, and that includes the fourth amendment.

And it is being violated and we are letting the administration tell us we need not worry.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York. I will just ask one further question along the same line.

Is it the judgment of the Senator from New York, given his years of experience on the Intelligence Committee, that we can in fact adopt the proposal which the Senator from New York is advocating without jeopardizing important sources and methods of our intelligence community?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I believe it to be so. If I may say to my friend from Colorado, as he well knows, S. 12 provision dropped in conference specifically states that if the President decides that for national security reasons he should not expel persons involved, he does not have to. But the presumption in our policy should be to expel foreign agents engaged in such activity.

Let the President judge, but let the President hear that Congress does not like this, and would prefer a different policy be adopted before this matter becomes a scandal. It bespeaks a fear of confrontation, that of serious confrontation, not symbolic confrontation.

Stop breaking the law in the Nation's Capital, not just violating the law, but violating the Constitution.

I think at this time is not the end of the subject as far as I am concerned, and I hope the Senator from Colorado agrees with me that we should discuss it at greater length at another time.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York, and I certainly do agree. We would hope that at that time those advocating or defending the administration position would be prepared to do so on the floor of the Senate.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:45 a.m. with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each. There is now less than 1 minute remaining.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I ask unanimous consent that the period for the transaction of routine morning business be extended 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ETHNIC AMERICAN DAY

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to again draw attention to Ethnic American Day. As a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 32, a resolution proclaiming September 15, 1985, as Ethnic American Day, I believe it is extremely important that we honor all Americans who, like myself, have roots in other countries around the world.

Ethnic American Day serves to remind us, just through its name, of two very important lessons. The world ethnic makes us realize that we are all of varying heritage. This was, and is, a new world that our parents and grandparents came to live in for the love of freedom. Through the symbolism of this day, we are all reminded of our heritage and encouraged never to forget what makes us different and special.

At the same time, it is not just Ethnic Day, but it is Ethnic American Day. The second word reminds us all that, although we were not originally indigenous to this country, we have now become Americans. We have not forgotten our cousins in foreign lands, but we have also found new families and friends in our new home.

America has truly been the land of opportunity, and part of what has truly enriched this country has been the wonderfully different cultures that have blended into this new melting pot. In my own State, representatives from all around the world can be found in Chinatown, Little Italy, Harlem, and elsewhere.

I am proud of both my heritage and my American birthright. All Americans—Asian, European, African, Middle Eastern, Latin American—should share this swelling pride and voice it on Ethnic American Day.

CRACKDOWN ON MARIJUANA

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, our entire Federal Government recognizes the need to crack down on domestic marijuana cultivation. Not only has the able Drug Enforcement Administration taken steps toward achieving the eradication of U.S. grown marijuana, but the entire Department of Justice has also mobilized its forces in this effort.

In a recent Washington Post editorial, these efforts are discussed, and the point is made that "While this country asks its Latin neighbors to take politically costly steps to stamp out their drug business, it behooves Americans to do something visible and major about their own." I couldn't agree more, and obviously, in light of most recent Federal actions, fellow Government officials agree with this assessment as well.

I was proud to have joined Senator STROM THURMOND recently in calling on the Department of Justice to take the necessary action to curb U.S. grown marijuana, by instituting a nationwide program of cannabis eradication. We took this opportunity to ask the Nation's Governors to form regional air operation task forces with the Federal Government to provide an invaluable deterrent in narcotics trafficking.

I am pleased that both agencies have acted expeditiously. The Department of Justice instituted Operation Delta 9—a 50-State raid on marijuana crops. This quick and effective action is to be commended, as is the bravery exhibited by the Federal law enforcement agents involved. There were, in fact, reports that agents were fired upon by defenders of the marijuana fields.

Mr. President, this is proof indeed that the traffickers in marijuana are no less harmful than the drug itself. The Washington Post editorial cites incontrovertible evidence of the destructiveness of marijuana, and concludes that increasing national awareness of the real dangers of this drug is the reason for declining marijuana consumption. As is stated in the Post:

> Now it seems that the country has reached an equilibrium on marijuana. Americans know it's unhealthy and use it less often. And they insist, properly, on enforcing the law against commercial production and distribution.

Mr. President, this is good news. But there are still unscrupulous drug producers, in our own country, who cultivate this harmful product for profit. It is encouraging that the Federal Government is embarking on this coordinated effort to enforce the laws against marijuana cultivation, sale and possession.

Mr. President, I ask that the Washington Post editorial entitled "The Crackdown on Marijuana," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CRACKDOWN ON MARIJUANA

When you see a picture of Attorney General Edwin Meese squinting at marijuana plants seized in a raid in the Ozark National Forest, you may be tempted to conclude, as one critic of the marijuana laws did, that Operation Delta-9—last Monday's 50-state raid of which the Ozark operation was part—was "just good propaganda." Certainly Mr. Meese understands that it is probably impossible to stamp out marijuana entirely. It is easily grown and in considerable demand. Possession and use of marijuana in small amounts is a minor offense now in most states.

Even so, we think Mr. Meese and his 2,200 federal, state and local comrades were not engaged in a quixotic enterprise. For one thing, while this country asks its Latin neighbors to take politically costly steps to stamp out their drug business, it behooves Americans to do something visible and major about their own. And if marijuana use is common, there is good evidence—about as good as is possible, considering that the activity is illegal—that marijuana use is less common in the 15-to-25 age group than it was a few years ago, and it may well be less common in older age groups as well.

So the predictions commonly made by marijuana advocates in the 1970s that the habit would become well-nigh universal have not come to pass. A dozen years ago you could not refute claims that marijuana smoking was harmless, and you had to concede that some of the claims made against it were exaggerated. But now, after a decade in which perhaps 30 million Americans have smoked marijuana, evidence of harm—harm on the order of that caused by tobacco and alcohol—is accumulating. It would not be surprising, then, in a nation where cigarette and liquor consumption is declining, if marijuana consumption were declining too.

In the 1970s it was said that marijuana, like alcohol, could not effectively be prohibited. But it was forgotten that, in the century up to repeal, alcohol use was vastly reduced in the United States, partly by legal prohibition, more by persuasion and the power of ideas. Alcohol use increased after repeal, but to nothing like the early 19th century levels. Now it seems that the country has reached an equilibrium on marijuana. Americans know it's unhealthy and use it less often. And they insist, properly, on enforcing the law against commercial production and distribution. Mr. Meese's raid in the Ozarks and Delta-9 serve a useful purpose not just in making the business of marijuana less secure but in underlining Americans' intention that this law should be enforced.

THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, one of the most difficult transitions that any organization can experience is a change in leadership at the top. Unless both the organization and its new chief executive are flexible, the passing of the torch can be a difficult, painful exchange.

With this thought in mind, I want to call to my Senate colleagues' attention that the Communications Workers of America, one of our Nation's pre-eminent labor unions, has recently undergone in a successful manner this rite of passage. On July 16, in San Francisco, CWA elected Morton Bahr to succeed Glenn E. Watts as CWA's president.

Morty Bahr has achieved a national reputation that easily exceeds the geographical jurisdiction over which he presided. Indeed, his compassionate commitment to human causes and his masterful skill as an organizer are qualities that are widespread in appeal.

Mr. President, Morty Bahr has a big challenge ahead of him. The telephone workers who built and maintained the Bell System find themselves in a period of great uncertainty during the time of the telephone divestiture. The breakup of the telephone company has resulted in significant upheaval in the telecommunications workplaces of America, with much dislocation. As CWA prepares to enter next year its first round of post-divestiture collective bargaining, the union faces a major task.

I am hopeful that Morton Bahr will guide CWA to a successful resolution of next year's contract negotiations. Similarly, it is vital that under his guiding hand CWA continue its proud tradition of serving as an active voice for achieving the enactment of responsible public laws.

I am confident that Morton Bahr will provide inspired leadership for CWA during this new era of dynamic change. I wish him well as he embarks upon this challenging endeavor.

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the International Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in the Soviet Union [IPG], I want to express my strong support for Dr. Andrei Sakharov and Elena Bonner.

The Soviet Union's cynical refusal to provide information on the Sakharov's whereabouts or to allow independent observers to verify Dr. Sakharov's condition is in direct violation of the Helsinki accords and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights.

General Secretary Gorbachev has made great efforts to convince us that he stands for peace. How are we to respond when Mr. Gorbachev treats Dr. Sakharov, a Nobel Peace Laureate, in such a callous manner?

I have pledged to Sakharov's stepson, Alexei Semyonov, that IPG's 700 members in 16 countries will not cease their efforts on Dr. Sakharov's behalf until he and Elena Bonner are allowed to leave the Soviet Union.

I urge President Reagan to meet with Alexei Semyonov to demonstrate that the United States believes that human rights for people like Dr. Sakharov is at the cornerstone of our democracy.

IPG has contacted our colleagues in the French Parliament to ask that President Mitterand also meet with Alexei. We believe that the Sakharov's plight must be raised forcefully during Mr. Gorbachev's visit to France next month.

Agreements between the United States and the Soviet Union prove effective only in proportion to our commitment to enforce them. The Reagan administration must tell Mr. Gorbachev that the United States will not have confidence in Soviet promises until the U.S.S.R. lives up to its human rights commitments to Andrei Sakharov and Elena Bonner.

CWA PRESIDENT MORTON BAHR—INNOVATIVE LEADER FOR CHALLENGING TIMES

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, at its 47th annual convention, the Communications Workers of America recently elected Morton Bahr as its new president. Mr. Bahr is a distinguished labor leader whose qualities of innovation and effectiveness have made an indelible impression on all of us who know him.

Indeed, we in Massachusetts are already aware of Morty Bahr's formidable leadership skills. For the past 16 years, he has served as CWA's vice president for the region of the United States that extends from New Jersey through Maine. During that period, Morty has provided bold, decisive directions for CWA to follow, and the union has benefited greatly from his experience.

In fact, his leadership ignited a period of major growth within CWA, with membership more than doubling during his tenure as head of the union's district 1.

Perhaps the best example of Morty Bahr's aggressive, foresighted tactics is his enduring commitment to organizing the unorganized, whether they work in the telecommunications field or in the public sector. Indeed, Mr. Bahr has been a pioneer within CWA in addressing the needs of State and local employees. He understands that public workers have the same dreams, goals, desires, and aspiration as private sector employees. In that connection, he played an indispensable role on behalf of CWA in enlisting into the union 32,000 public workers in New Jersey.

In addition to organizing, political activity has been at the core of Morty Bahr's career. He has been a delegate to the last three Democratic National Convention, and in 1980 he was a member of the National Democratic Platform Committee.

More than this, Morty Bahr has also been a special friend to me, and I am particularly grateful for the wise, counsel and support he has given to me over the years.

Mr. President, Morty Bahr is not only eminently qualified to be president of CWA, but he and the world's largest telecommunications union are a nearly perfect match.

CWA is a progressive, community-mined union. Its legislative agenda on Capital Hill is one of the most comprehensive of any national organization. It is also an activist union with grassroots rank-and-file members residing in all 50 States and in each of the 435 congressional districts of American.

At this special time for Morty Bahr, I also want to acknowledge his indispensable partner, Florence, and their two children. I know that they are proud of Morty's accomplishment and the success he has achieved.

As CWA approaches its golden anniversary, which will take place in less than 3 years, I am pleased that the leadership of this progressive union is in the capable hands of Morty Bahr. He is a thoughtful executive and a man of bold action. His proven track record is an invaluable asset to CWA and to the entire American labor movement, and I am honored to congratulate him on his extraordinary career and the new honor he has richly earned.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a biographical profile of Morty Bahr, and the text of his eloquent acceptance speech at the CWA Convention in San Francisco last July.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CWA—A BIOGRAPHICAL PROFILE OF MORTON BAHR, PRESIDENT, COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO

Morton Bahr, the third president of the Communications Workers of America, brings more than three decades of experience to the task of leading the world's largest communications union. CWA represents more than 650,000 workers throughout the United States.

His election as CWA President on July 16, 1985 represents the latest milestone in a career that has been characterized by achievement and an uncompromising commitment to the trade union cause.

A Record of Accomplishment: Prior to his election to CWA's highest position, Bahr served for 16 years as Vice President of CWA's District 1 which includes New York, New Jersey, and the New England States. First elected, District 1 Vice President in 1969, Bahr's leadership ignited a period of major growth within the District, with membership more than doubling during his tenure.

Bahr has been instrumental in CWA's increased organizing efforts in the public sector. CWA's first major entry into public sector organizing came in 1955 in District 1 when 5,000 New York City public workers chose CWA as their union. From that starting point, CWA has steadily increased its visibility in the public sector to a point where today the union represents some 80,000 public workers. And much of this public sector growth has come in District 1 under Bahr's guidance.

A Commitment to Organizing: Organizing has always been a top priority with Morton Bahr.

Bahr's first association with CWA came in 1951 when he joined the union's organizing campaign at Mackay Radio & Telegraph Company (now ITT World Communications) where he had been employed as a radio operator since 1947. He was instrumental in CWA's organizing victory at the company, became increasingly active in union affairs, and was elected President of CWA Local 1172 in 1954.

In December, 1957 Bahr joined the national CWA staff as an organizer, and his first assignment was to direct CWA's ambitious effort to bring some 24,000 workers of the New York Telephone Company's plant department into the union. His determination and commitment again paid dividends, the result being a major organizing victory for CWA.

In recognition of his leadership in the New York Telephone organizing drive, Bahr was named CWA's New York Director in 1961. He held that post for two years before being promoted to Assistant to the Vice President of District 1.

Bahr recalls the 1960s as both a time of turmoil and solidarity within CWA. The turmoil came as a result of attempts by the Teamsters to raid established CWA units in New York. Bahr directed the anti-Teamster campaigns for CWA. On every occasion when there was an attempted takeover by the Teamsters, CWA was the overwhelming choice of the workers, with the margin of CWA victories increasing with each election. Hence the solidarity, which grew out of turmoil.

That solidarity was further tested in 1971 when CWA staged an historic 218-day strike against New York Telephone. Some 55,000 workers honored the mammoth strike which Bahr believes finally paved the way for national bargaining with the pre-divestiture Bell System, a long-sought goal of CWA.

"They strike and the unity we showed and the ultimate victory we won, had a profound impact on our union, not just in New York, but nationwide," Bahr recalls. "It showed us what we could accomplish when we're unified, it raised our expectations of ourselves, and it showed the company, as it existed then, that national bargaining was an idea whose time had come."

With the national bargaining concept achieved, Bahr Served on CWA's bargaining committees each of the four times between 1974 and 1983 when coordinated bargaining between CWA and the pre-divestiture AT&T took place. Each of those efforts resulted in record-breaking contract settlements for CWA.

Looking To The Future: As a result of the historic AT&T divestiture, Bahr Says CWA members must "develop a new mindset about our jobs, our companies, and about our union."

An overriding objective of the Bahr presidency is an attempt "to constantly remind our members that the union plays a greater role in their quality of life than any other institution. We want the union to play a major role in the decision-making process of our member's lives, in everything from consumer purchases to political action."

"We must develop a vision for the future for our members that reassures them that they can count on their union through difficult times . . . that their union has the ability to shape events. We must present our members with a vision of what we want to be and what we can be."

Bahr believes CWA's future is filled with growth potential because:

CWA is the established union in the major growth sectors of our economy—white collar and information services.

Workers in the future will want security and advancement in the telecommunications industry, not just with a single job, department or company. They will look to the union to service those needs.

CWA's strength and reputation makes it an attractive union to professionals and women who are looking for improved employment opportunities.

CWA enjoys a strong presence in the fastest growing part of the labor movement—public workers.

Our union enjoys a position of strong political influence at the local, regional and national levels.

Community Service: Morton Bahr typifies CWA's longstanding reputation as the community minded union. He is a trustee of Nassau (N.Y.) Community College, a member of the Board of Governors of the United Way of America, and has served three years as labor chair for the Greater New York Blood Bank.

Bahr has been extremely active in Democratic Party politics at both the national and local levels. He was a delegate to the 1976, 1980, and 1984 Democratic National Conventions, and in 1980 he was a member of the National Democratic Platform Committee. He also chaired the statewide labor committees which played an integral role in the elections of New York Governors Hugh Carey and Mario Cuomo.

Born in Brooklyn, New York on July 18, 1926, Bahr graduated from Samuel J. Tilden High School. During World War II, he served as a radio officer in the U.S. Merchant Marine. He holds a Bachelor of Science Degree in Labor Studies from Empire State College.

He is married to the former Florence Slobodow. They have two children and four grandchildren. The Bahrs reside in Washington, D.C.

ACCEPTANCE SPEECH BY MORTON BAHR, CWA CONVENTION, JULY 16, 1985, SAN FRANCISCO, CA

Brothers and sisters, thank you . . . for your support and the confidence that you have expressed in me. But this recognition and honor could not have been possible without the hard work, trade union dedication and friendship of so many of my colleagues throughout the union.

And I also want to introduce my wife, Florence. I must admit that like the spouses of many elected union officials, she isn't altogether convinced that you've done us a favor.

But she's shared CWA's victories and defeats over many years, and she remains my most important advisor and thoughest critic.

I want to begin my remarks by paraphrasing the feelings Dr. Martin Luther King once expressed on an occasion similar to this:

"With an abiding faith in our union and an audacious faith in the future of the American Labor movement, I accept the awesome responsibilities of serving as your president."

It's said that the test of a great leader is to leave behind in others the same conviction, dedication and will to meet the challenges of the day. Glenn and Louis, you have met that test with flying colors.

On behalf of all of us in CWA and the international labor movement who have benefited so much from your leadership, thank you.

Last night, we paid tribute to your contributions to our union. But I want to offer my personal thoughts to the entire convention as we bid you farewell.

You have led this union through a great struggle. You have prepared us well for the massive challenges generated by divestiture, technological change and Reaganomics. You have shown us that we can stand successfully against unjust concessionary bargaining.

You have put into place the policies from which we build upon as we move from the Watts-Knecht era. And you set a new standard of unselfish union leadership which has led us to this moment. The unity and solidarity that we enjoy here is the single greatest, living memorial that could be erected in your name.

You deserve our gratitude, forever. . . .

Sisters and brothers, today the torch of leadership changes hands for only the third time in the short history of CWA.

And as we confront the challenges of our day, let's take courage from our history:

CWA was born out of the first nationwide telephone strike in 1947 which demonstrated the need for a strong union that could build unity among workers.

Since then, our union has grown from the cradle of struggle.

Our union has matured from our ability to change.

And today, CWA represents more than 650,000 workers. And we have broken new membership ground in the public and service sectors, organizing tens of thousands of public, health care and other workers.

We are poised for the future because CWA is the union of the future the technology union.

And technological change is touching the lives of nearly every worker in nearly every industry.

By 1990, for example, we estimate that more than 30 million jobs will require some level of technical skills.

So, let the past protect our tradition and heritage from which we gather so much strength.

But to reach our goals in the future, we must sail onward . . . sometimes with the wind and sometimes against the wind. But sail we must. We cannot lie at anchor in memories of the past, nor drift with the tides, wishing things were the way they used to be.

These are, indeed, "new times for new leaders."

When Jim and I discussed the objectives of our administration, we both immediately agreed that we must not allow our union to be frozen into inaction by fear of failure.

We intend to try new ideas. We intend to encourage initiative among the staff. We intend to reach out to the locals for experimentation. We intend to involve each individual member in the future of our union.

And where we have problems, I want to know about it so we can take corrective measures. Because I pledge to you that "the buck really does stop here."

Now, we all should know what this union is against:

We are against the politics of insensitivity and selfishness.

We are against the economics of runaway industries and the nonunion/anti-union environment.

We are against the notion that government has no role in the battle for equal opportunity because women and minorities already have too many rights.

So, I want to outline what this union should stand for . . . . our vision of where we want to lead this union and why:

Next year's round of bargaining is our most immediate concern.

Negotiations with AT&T should look very much like it did in the past except that it will involve 200,000 workers instead of half a million. We will retain the national bargaining structure just like before, with negotiations on local contracts.

As most of you know, AT&T has decided to produce residential telephones in Singapore. . . . The first time AT&T has gone offshore to manufacture equipment. This decision is symptomatic of the national problem caused by so many U.S.-based companies which are trying to cut their production costs by going overseas. And it shows once again that we are not immune from the economic and political events which occur around us. As a result, negotiating stronger job security arrangements becomes an even higher priority.

But even though we face difficult circumstances, a sound working relationship exists between management and the union. I'm confident that we can reach a settlement that will be fair to us, and still permit the company to compete effectively in the new environment.

The situation with the seven regional companies is quite different.

They are doing very, very well. We should expect them to share their economic wealth with the workers who make their profits possible. "Take-backs," "give-backs" or any other form of erosion in our contracts are unacceptable.

And we are well aware of the inferior health programs—the so-called "flex benefits"—which have been imposed on management. We recognize that these "cafeteria-style" benefits are nothing more than an attempt to shift the cost of health care to the workers. We reject it out of hand.

The company tried to weaken our health benefits in 1983, and we sent them a message then. And we are going to give the same message to the regional companies . . . or AT&T . . . or general telephone . . . if they bring the same concessionary demands to the bargaining table in 1986.

Two-tiered wage systems pose the same dangers. These divisive pay plans strike at the very heart of the concept of "equal pay for equal work" and drive a wedge between workers. We will not allow our union to be split by two-tiered wage systems, and will not accept them in our contracts.

In our dealings with the regional companies, our priority goal has been to secure region-wide bargaining, where economic matters would be discussed at a single table with local negotiations in each bargaining unit as in the past. Most of the companies have agreed to some form of regional bargaining. They agree with us that State-by-State bargaining will result in leap frogging, delay and unnecessary confrontation.

But some regional companies still are insisting on localized bargaining. We serve notice on them that a return to the kind of charade-type negotiations that existed in the telephone industry before 1974 will be met with the appropriate response by our union.

Of course, many factors will come into play at the table: The shadow of competitors hovers in the background; regulatory bodies may try to interfere in the collective bargaining process: Divestiture will continue to evolve under Judge Greene's review; and our own members must quickly realize that a new day really has come to the telecommunciations industry.

But notwithstanding the fact that the regions are separate companies, this union intends to work hard to keep major benefits, such as pensions and health insurance, from slipping. We fought hard for these benefits over many years and intend to keep them as uniform as possible.

This union will undertake the appropriate strategy if some of the regional companies think they can break our unity at the bargaining table by trying to play off one group of our members against the other.

So, we are ready if management is going to challenge us. This national leadership team has been tested under fire many, many times in the past. And it would be very short-sighted of our employers if they think we are going to bend now.

Our response today to the actions of the regional companies could very well impact on negotiations for thousands of other workers. So, these principles also will guide our strategy in bargaining for all telecommunications units and for our other major contracts, particularly with the State of New Jersey when that agreement covering 34,000 public workers expires next year.

We have much preparation to do . . . research to undertake . . . communication to complete before we begin negotiations in 1986.

Organizing will become a priority activity that involves my personal attention.

Our union faces the future with hope and optimism. But the rest of the labor movement is in a fight for survival. Organized labor today represents less than 18 percent of the work force. Once mighty unions are shells of their former greatness. The same can happen to CWA if we allow ourselves to go into intellectual retirement.

As you know, IBM recently completed a deal where it can acquire up to 30 percent of MCI, the second largest long-distance company. Coupled with their ownership of Rolm and their videotex deal with CBS and Sears, IBM now has put together the pieces which make it a head-to-head competitor with AT&T.

They did it barely 18 months after divestiture.

IBM also is one of the most anti-union companies in the world. And the employees of MCI and Rolm must be having nightmares about being absorbed into the IBM culture.

I had planned to make this announcement later. But the speed of the IBM-MCI deal indicates that we must issue a timely response.

In September, we will be attending a meeting of the postal, telegraph and telephone international. I will at that time propose that a conference be held of union representatives from all the countries around the world where IBM has plants. I would like this meeting to take place as soon as possible after our 1986 bargaining is completed.

The purpose of the conference will be to analyze the global anti-union policies of IBM, set up a permanent clearinghouse of information and develop strategy to begin a worldwide coordinated organizing campaign against IBM.

We will combine the political economic and social strength of organized labor throughout the world in an effort to target specific IBM plants for organizing breakthroughs. We will label IBM as the J.P. Stevens of the international telecommunications industry.

This will be a long-term effort. It will require patience. But IBM—and all of the other non-union companies in the industry—will come to know that we are serious about protecting our union-won wages, fringe benefits and job security.

And, then, IBM's non-union threat will no longer hover over our bargaining table. We'll cast a giant shadow over them when CWA rises as the future of opportunity for IBM workers.

In the short term, we will focus our attention on the unorganized workers in the telephone industry and other telecommunications companies. And we serve notice on the regional companies that cooperation is a two-way street that doesn't just walk in the companies' direction. They cannot expect us to cooperate with them if they insist on a so-called "union free environment" in the operations of their unregulated subsidaries.

I further want to emphasize our commitment to bring the benefits of trade unionism to public workers. We will achieve membership breakthroughs among the hundreds of thousands of other public, health care and service workers in the nation.

Joe Beirne once held the notion that CWA could conduct a nationwide organizing campaign by turning each union member into an organizer because they live in nearly every community in the Nation. We must make his vision a reality if we are to survive the technological revolution.

We must intensify our political involvement, particularly at the local level.

The moral health of a nation is just as important as our economic health. But I fear our Nation's political life is dominated by people who preach about principles rather than living up to them.

As a result, I see a pattern of selfish insensitivity sweeping the country, and which emanates from the leadership of President Reagan and the Republican Party.

It is the kind of selfish insensitivity that asks, "Are you better off?", rather than your country. . . .

The kind of insensitivity that turns the Government agency of the workers—the National Labor Relations Board—into the enemy of the representatives of the workers.

That peace in the world can be achieved by building bigger and costlier nuclear weapons. . . .

That apartheid in South Africa will go away if we just shut our eyes and close our mouths. . . .

But what troubles me most is the growing selfish insensitivity in our country that has led to the unprecedented rise of hate groups committed to violence against anybody who doesn't fit into some twisted version of Aryan perfection.

I believe most Americans prefer Adlai Stevenson's definition of patriotism which is "the steady dedication of a lifetime," not frenzied outbursts of emotion.

That's why I'm convinced that America will return to its traditions of fair play. Justice and compassion for all. Until then, CWA and the rest of the labor movement must stand as a bulwark in the political arena against the conservative tides of selfishness and insensitivity.

We must open the doors of union leadership even wider.

I remember a time in the not too distant past when an invisible sign hung over the employment offices of every telephone company in America that warned, "Jews, blacks and other minorities need not apply."

Inside was another sign that said, "women wanted for cheap wages."

CWA was in the forefront of the battle to rip down both signs from the employment offices of the telephone industry and to open the doors of opportunity to all in every other industry in America.

And we can all take pride in CWA's record of support for human rights, whether at home or in such far away places as in South Africa and the Soviet Union.

Now, we must aggressively reach out to embrace all workers within the ranks of leadership in our union. Encouraging more working women and minorities to join us as full-fledged partners in CWA must rank as a top objective.

CWA will provide additional services and programs which encourage the involvement of all our members and their families in our union. I intend to recommend to the CWA executive board that, beginning in 1986, we offer child care at our national convention if a demonstrated need exists. And we strongly encourage similar programs to be developed in connection with district meetings and local membership meetings.

And the union will do more than offer child care.

We will bargain for the economic and social incentives that make it possible for women and minority workers to become more active in our union. And we must keep that objective in mind as we develop our bargaining demands.

We must close the communications gap that exists between the member and the union.

During my travels of the past 6 months, I've become convinced that we face a monumental communications task.

We will encourage a policy of agressively reaching out from every level of our union to our members and potential members. We must reach them on the shop floor, in the office and in their homes.

We must cultivate an image among our members that strengthens the union's credibility in their eyes. Union leaders at all levels must inspire trust and serve as an alternative source of information that is believed and respected communicating with our members is a year-round effort, not something we engage in during the political season or as bargaining approaches. We must become committed to compete in the arena of public opinion for the hearts of our members as well as their minds.

And our message must be the vision this union sees for the future; that CWA has the confidence to control events which shape the lives of our members and potential members, and that this union has the power to improve the worklife and family life of all Americans.

I've laid out an ambitious agenda.

Obviously, these objectives will not be reached soon . . . and certainly not by any one person or team of national union leaders.

That's why we must emphasize the concept of family within CWA as part of our program to involve all of the members of our union in our union.

We need you. . . .

We need all of you. . . .

We want your immediate family to become a part of your CWA family.

We want your spouses involved. . . .

We want your children involved. . . .

We will need their strength and support to help us revitalize our movement. . . . to help restore some of the idealism and energy that the labor movement used to have in its early days.

So, let us send this message to our employers, the politicians, the anti-union baiters, the news media and the workers who want to join with us in the future:

From this day forth, we are rededicating ourselves to building a stronger CWA and a stronger labor movement.

And whether we face the uncertainties of divestiture or the demands of the telecommunications revolution, CWA will turn today's challenges into the opportunities of tomorrow. . . .

Whether we confront an anti-union environment in the White House or the corporate board room, CWA will defend the right of all workers to enjoy the benefits of trade unionism. . . .

Whether we sail against the wind, or with the wind, CWA will speak out for the trade union principles which have brought so much progress to our Nation. . . .

And while others may write about the demise of the American labor movement, CWA will spark a renaissance of brotherhood and sisterhood within our ranks that proclaims:

We're committed. . . .

We're united. . . .

We're family. . . .

We're union . . . and we're damn proud of it.

Thank you.

ACTION NEEDED NOW ON ANTI-APARTHEID LEGISLATION

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the decision of the Reagan administration to impose limited sanctions against South Africa, while very late, still represents a positive step forward. This administrative action, however, makes no less critical the urgent need for Senate passage of H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985.

The President's action signifies an important departure from the administration's policy of quiet opposition to apartheid, and likely influenced President Botha's decision to restore citizenship to the millions of South African blacks to whom it has been denied under that country's "homelands" policy.

While this symbolic departure from the ideology underlying apartheid is noteworthy, it is not nearly enough. The United States must insist that Pretoria move more aggressively toward dismantling apartheid.

Earlier this week, our Ambassador to South Africa, Herman Nickel, addressed the need for fundamental reform in South Africa by noting that:

We have gotten beyond the point where mere statements, or even just statements of intent are adequate. Things have to be seen to be happening. Negotiations have to be seen to be starting. Some of the key features of the apartheid system have to be seen to be abolished.

I strongly agree.

The United States must make clear to the white minority Government of South Africa that normal relations between our two countries cannot continue unless and until apartheid is dismantled and the central issue of political powersharing with the nation's black majority is addressed and resolved. I believe our Government can advance that cause by clearly demonstrating our opposition to apartheid, and by stating forcefully our view that Pretoria must engage in serious reforms and begin serious negotiations with black political leaders.

The President has appealed to Members of Congress to join him in presenting a unified position against apartheid. I believe that Senate passage of H.R. 1460 is the most appropriate way to respond to that call, and, in fact, would strengthen the President's position as an advocate for genuine reform in South Africa.

The close votes which have occurred in the Senate this week on the question of moving to a final vote on the Anti-Apartheid Act, are dramatic proof of the strong desire of this body to take action to address the deteriorating situation in South Africa.

While it is true that the Executive order of the President incorporates certain of the provisions contained in the pending legislation, some important differences exist.

First, H.R. 1460 would immediately impose a ban on the importation of Krugerrands, while the President would seek a ruling from GATT before a ban is imposed.

Second, the President imposes no deadline for making further racial reforms to avoid future sanctions. H.R. 1460, however, offers important incentives for action by calling for more severe sanctions within 1 year if no significant progress is made in eliminating apartheid.

Third, administratively imposed sanctions differ qualitatively from legislatively imposed sanctions. While the former can be put into effect one day and lifted the next, the latter, once signed by the President, has the force of law, and is not so easily undone.

The overwhelming bipartisan support for the pending legislation must be permitted to demonstrate itself in the Senate, just as it was demonstrated in the House. The President should encourage congressional participation on this critical issue in order to demonstrate the strong opposition of the American people to the inhumane policy of apartheid, and to do justice to the outrage felt in this country over the injustices currently being imposed on South Africa's black majority.

It is critically important that the President and the American people, through their elected representatives in the Congress, act as one in opposing apartheid. Prompt Senate passage of H.R. 1460 will cement that partnership, and will place this country more forcefully on the side of ending apartheid in South Africa forever.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business, if not morning business is closed.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of the pending business, S. 1200, which the clerk will now state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1200) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to effectively control the unauthorized immigration to the United States, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 600

Pending:

Hawkins Amendment No. 600, to extend the income and eligibility verification system under section 1137 of the Social Security Act, so as to provide for verification of immigration status in the cases of aliens applying for benefits under specified welfare and other programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is amendment No. 600 of the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS].

The Senator from Florida.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, the amendment that is at the desk is an effort to strengthen the enforcement provisions in the immigration bill and at the same time allow the States and Federal taxpayers a portion of their hard-earned tax dollars to be put back in their own pockets.

The immigration bill we are considering today establishes the sense of Congress regarding two essential elements necessary to regain control of illegal immigration.

One of these elements is, "an increase in * * * enforcement activities of the Immigration and Naturalizations Service and of other appropriate Federal agencies in order to prevent and deter the illegal entry of aliens into the United States and the violation of the terms of their entry."

The principle that underlies my amendment is simple: a person who has broken U.S. immigration laws and entered this country illegally should not have access to U.S. Government benefits that are paid for by U.S. taxpayers.

People want to come to the United States for many reasons. We have a waiting list. Some are fleeing persecution, and those we accept without reservation, and the Indochinese boat people are a good example, and the Mariel refugees. Others are looking to improve their lives for themselves, for their children, and for their grandchildren. The basis for our laws on legal immigration is family reunification. Only a small percentage of the aliens who want to live in the United States legally can do so without a family member being here before them. The first, second, fourth, and fifth preference categories are reserved for people related to U.S. citizens or permanent residents. This means that up to 80 percent of the people who enter the United States under the preference system are related to someone who is already in the United States in a legal status. Exceptions are sometimes made for people who will make a significant contribution to American society, and so forth. Gone are the days when we can afford to receive people simply because they want to live in the United States. Today, we can only reserve that privilege for people facing persecution or threats to their lives in their homelands.

The result, plain and simple, is that today it is difficult to get a visa to live in the United States for the purpose of becoming a permanent resident or a citizen. In some cases, the wait is months; in others, it is years. For this reason, hundreds of thousands if not millions of people try to enter the United States each year illegally.

These people are looking for a better life for themselves and their children, and who can blame them. The United States is not unsympathetic to these needs. That is one of the reasons why we give billions of dollars each year to foreign countries in foreign aid. And I urge my colleagues to review the foreign aid bill country by country and the amount of money given to each one of those countries by U.S. taxpayers.

But we have an obligation first to the people of the United States, the people who we were elected to represent. People who enter the United States illegally have broken the law, and increasingly we find that when they take jobs, they take them from Americans. The workplace for the illegal alien is no longer limited to the lettuce fields or fruit orchards of the San Joaquin Valley in California. There is evidence of illegals working in factory jobs and other positions that have little relation to the low pay and poor conditions of many of agricultural jobs that have been the mainstay of the illegal work force.

This Senator's view is that even with the recent dip in the unemployment rate, too many Americans, especially young Americans, are out of work, and that it is fundamentally unfair for people who have broken our laws and entered the United States illegally to hold a job at the expense of an American. We have an obligation to Americans first, and that is what this debate over enforcement in the bill is all about.

The debate over enforcement in the bill is a great responsibility for each and every Member to reflect upon as we vote on this bill.

The basis for enforcement in this bill is employer sanctions. I endorse this approach and have done so each of the previous two times the Senate has voted on immigration legislation. The lure that draws so many illegals to the United States is clearly the hope of a job that can provide a source of income for them and their family. Employer sanctions makes it illegal for an employer to hire a person who is in the United States illegally. If the lure that draws illegals here in the first place evaporates then so will the desire to come to the United States.

There is, however, another side to this issue, and that side is welfare and other Federal payments to illegals. Whether they are working or not, many of the illegals who are in the United States qualify for various types of Federal benefits, benefits they are not entitled to, benefits that are paid for by our tax paying constituents, benefits that contribute to the Federal deficit, which we read about on a daily basis.

If it is unfair and unlawful for illegal aliens to receive certain Federal benefits, then why shouldn't the Federal Government take aggressive action to cut down on the number of illegals who get these benefits. That question is all the more relevant when the potential savings for Federal and State governments could be in the billions of dollars and when the ability to do so is readily available.

That is the purpose of my amendment, and it affects such programs as Medicaid, Unemployment Compensation, Food Stamps, and Aid to Families and Dependent Children [AFDC].

First, this provision mandates that States require all recipients for such aid, declare in writing, under penalty of perjury, whether or not the individual is a citizen of the United States, and if not a citizen of the United States, the individual would have to present the appropriate documentation from the INS showing his or her alien admission or alien file number.

Second, if the applicant is not a U.S. citizen, the State is required to use the person's alien file or alien registration number to verify with the Immigration and Naturalization Service the alien's immigration status through a system that first, uses the alien's name, file or admission number to permit efficient verification; and second, protects the alien's privacy to the maximum degree possible.

Third, if the verification check reveals that the alien is ineligible for these benefits, the benefits shall not be reduced or terminated until the alien has had an opportunity to present documents establishing their eligibility.

Fourth, and most fairly, benefits shall be terminated for aliens who are ineligible.

Fifth, the INS is instructed to have the verification system available for use by the States by October 1, 1987—not 1985, 1987.

Last, as an incentive for States to implement this system, the Federal Government would provide 90 percent matching funds to States for the non-labor costs of implementing and operating this system.

The potential savings from this legislation is incredible. The INS has done some research and conducted several pilot projects on this and has found it to be both doable and worthwhile—worthwhile to the tune of $10.7 billion if a full program of eligibility verification were required for each State. Even if the INS' estimated savings are overly optimistic—by 100 percent or even 200 percent we would still have savings in the range of $2.5 billion to $5 billion. How can anyone blink at that savings when we are talking about the deficit?

In these days of budget consciousness we all need to be looking for ways to save money—and this does it in a big way. And it does it by making sure that people who should not be getting welfare payments do not get them.

The costs of setting up and running this program are minimal especially when compared to the astronomical savings potential.

Mr. President, this is an amendment designed to provide for efficient enforcement of our current laws. It does so while at the same time providing safeguards for the privacy of the individual. And the result could be budget savings in the billions of dollars.

I believe that we need this amendment now and I urge my colleagues to give it their full support.

Mr. SIMPSON address the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it has been a great and distinct pleasure to work with the Senator from Florida on immigration reform. She has been the most extraordinary helpmate that I have had. She is not just from a State deeply affected. Her State is the most deeply affected, obviously, by the impact of refugees and those we extend our heart and hand to and we should always be available to do that. Her State is affected by the impact of the Cuban-Haitain entrants. There is no one who pays more dogged attention to the difficulties of Florida that I know of. She corners me once in a while and says, "What are you doing about this in Florida? We are the most heavily impacted."

She considers all the issues of immigration, legal or illegal, and the issues of those seeking asylum such as the boat people, a whole array of different definitions applied to human beings that we deal with in the subcommittee. I thank her for that.

I know of the sincerity in all the things she has done on this issue and in the things she has done to assist in immigration reform.

I do know what the SAVE project is, systematic alien verification for entitlements. I think it is a remarkable program. I commend Commissioner Alan Nelson for implementing it. It is going to save this country big bucks.

My problem is, and I share it with you so that there will be no misreading of it, that three States now have demonstration projects. We have California, Colorado, and Illinois. It is making an impact. There are great savings to be accomplished in Illinois, California, and Colorado. They have chosen to do it and their State legislatures have authorized it. They have moved forward. I think that is great. I am very pleased with that.

We know what it does. The Senator has described it well. It allows the State public assistance programs and administering agencies to do a computer search of an alien's immigration status before granting that alien public assistance benefits. It relies on computerized access to the INS records.

I can tell you that those records were in disarray before Commissioner Alan Nelson came to the fore, and now the INS is becoming very adept at computer access, computerized records. It is long overdue, but they are doing a remarkable job.

Indeed, this can be applied to determine State welfare benefits or Federal benefits. The demonstration projects are being successful.

I guess what I am saying in all that laudatory commentary is that it is an important problem and the Senator addresses it skillfully. It is another evidence of our systems being gimmicked.

We know in California that when they said, "You are going to have to file this affidavit, or do this procedure before you gain public assistance," 43 percent of the applicants dropped at that point. That shows something, obviously, especially in California where there is a tremendous network of Federal, State, local, and municipal assistance to almost every kind of human being, legal or illegal. They are paying a heavy price for that. The influx of persons alone who come there solely to seek the benefits of assistance is one problem.

Another is the tremendous dependency that we find, especially among refugees, in California and Florida. That dependency rate is double and triple anything in the rest of the United States.

The potential savings are impressive.

My serious questions about the program are really these: Whether all States need it, whether the technology is actually efficient at this time to avoid mistaken denials of assistance benefits, and whether all the certain privacy issues have been resolved.

A bill similar to this amendment to amend the Social Security Act has been sent to the Finance Committee. That is another aspect: This amendment is not even a Judiciary Committee item.

I guess I am saying that I would prefer, under these circumstances and given my feeling about Federal-State relationships, that we allow the demonstration projects to continue in States that wish to do that. I think when the other States see what California, Colorado, and Illinois are coming up with in the way of just plain savings of bucks, they will be impressed by it. However, I would not want to see it come down as a Federal law at this time as part of this proposal. If we wish to do it, let us proceed with it. I would not resist allowing the States to do it. But let us continue the demonstration projects.

At this point in the debate, on this issue with this project, I will not vote in favor of the amendment and will resist it. But I do know fully what is intended. I just want to wait longer to see how the demonstration projects work in the States.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, in working with the chairman of the subcommittee, he has been most helpful to my State and to all States with his expertise on this question. Of course, in Florida, we do have a great deal of experience in this matter.

If we adopt my amendment, however, it requires that each State sign up for the program with Federal funding absorbing 90 percent of the non-labor cost, and then that will help us to stop the movement from State to State. If a State is on a program now and finds out that a person is illegal, the alien can simply move to another State where the State is not on the program and they sign up there.

In the end, however, it is the Federal Government and it is the Federal deficit that we are always having to talk about.

I must say that the incentive is there. I have been following the programs that went into effect in the various States, with the INS asking people to sign on. The INS went into the States asking them to volunteer for an immigration verification program to show how much money could be saved in the welfare system concerning payments to illegal aliens. Some States did and some States did not. Some States may come on shortly.

It is my opinion that if we put it in Florida, that would be wonderful. But nothing prevents the people who will be denied from going to another State.

If we adopt my amendment, it will enable the Federal Government to document whether these people are illegal or not. It puts it into a national computer, a lot like the FBI has for missing children, missing automobiles, and missing whatever else.

I serve on the Agriculture Committee where we are laboring at the present moment, on food stamps. We have a terrible problem on food stamps with American citizens. It is not whether they are eligible but whether they are getting more than they need. They have to fill out all kinds of papers and they now have to say, "I am not lying on the application."

If an American citizen has to do that, I see no reason why an illegal alien should not have to go through a similar process. I hope we will have all States sign up for this program, giving them a method for the first time since I have been a Senator to be able to account for these people and as a result the States can determine whether they should give them the State benefits. It is twofold.

I cannot say enough about how shocked I think American citizens would be if they knew how easy it is for illegal aliens to get benefits, aid for dependent children, unemployment compensation, Medicaid, and food stamps, at a time when we are in rooms all over this Capitol having meetings trying to come within the budget, trying to cut a million here and a million there. I am giving the Senate an opportunity to cut billions, not millions. I think it was Everett Dirksen, a distinguished Senator who served in this body, who said, "A billion here, a billion there, and soon we are talking about real money." We are talking about real money.

I also think we are talking about a companion to employer sanctions. It is simply a reenforcement of the effort to stem the flow of illegal aliens into this country and to save a lot of the taxpayers' money as a result of evaluating an alien's eligibility for these benefits.

I certainly do not want to deny them to anyone who is eligible. We have language in the amendment when, if there is a question, we will allow the applicant to continue to receive the benefits until it can be documented once and for all that they are not. It is not unkind, it is not inhumane. It is doing Government business in a businesslike manner with the technology of the eighties. We have the ability. States have absolutely saved hundreds of millions of dollars. We have our State, Florida, going on the program shortly. We do not need to wait, as custodians of the Federal purse, while State after State finds out that this may or may not work; we better copy Illinois' program which has been fantastically successful and a model for the whole United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Florida. The Senator from Florida I think is well intentioned for the reasons that she has outlined on the floor this morning. She is, I am sure, very well aware of the pilot project, Project SAVE, which is in place now, developed by the INS to try to address the particular issue which she is addressing with her amendment. But it is entirely premature to take what is I think a useful and constructive idea and carve it into stone, as this amendment would do if it is accepted in this legislation, should the legislation pass, because the jury is out with regard to this proposal.

I would like to ask the Senator from Florida whether this particular amendment is supported by the INS.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I am told by the INS Commissioner that the pilot projects are over. They have tested this since the late seventies in California. Illinois and Colorado have been on the pilots since 1982. Florida, which is going on the program October-November, is the first step toward a permanent program. So there are no more pilots. They have learned enough.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is not exactly the question. The question is: Does the INS support this particular amendment? Does the Department of Justice urge us to accept this amendment? Has the Attorney General indicated so or has the head of the INS indicated support for this particular amendment?

Mrs. HAWKINS. As far as my experience as a U.S. Senator, if you had to get each agency's OK before we introduced legislation on this floor, we would still be talking about missing children, which we did in 1981. It took a long time to bring the Justice Department on board on that, and even longer to get the National Center For Missing Children. I found it my experience as a U.S. Senator to do what I think is the right thing, and tell these agencies what they should be doing, let us get on with it. I do not ask agencies if they want to do this. It has been my experience they do not like to do much other than what they have been doing the last 50 years. But since this experiment has been going on in California since the late seventies, and 1982 in Illinois and Colorado and is over, the pilot is over, the program is on board, this says all States come in, we are ready. I think it is our responsibility to vote for it.

Mr. KENNEDY. I gather the answer is no because if the INS supported this particular program, thought they had sufficient information on these studies, and had the capability to do it, they would have come before the Committee of the Judiciary and indicate that.

Mrs. HAWKINS. The Commissioner of INS supports the program. There is no official administration position, which is not unique on this issue at this point in time. We, therefore, have an opportunity to set position.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator saying INS supports the amendment of the Senator from Florida? Can we get a yes or no? Because I want to move this whole debate along a little bit. And if so, could the Senator explain it to other Members for their information?

Mrs. HAWKINS. The Commissioner supports the concept.

Mr. KENNEDY. I support the concept.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Commissioner Nelson cannot mandate the program for all 50 States. That is why we are here. In answer to the Senator's question, there is no official administration position as yet on this. I imagine that would come after we see what we are going to do with the immigration bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I gather then now that the answer is no, there is no——

Mrs. HAWKINS. Not necessarily.

Mr. KENNEDY. If I may have regular order. I am going to inquire of the Senator from Florida and I welcome getting a response to my question, Does the administration support it, the answer is no. Does the INS, which has conducted this particular study? The answer is no. I gather from the response I have just received from the Senator from Florida, that when the INS was before the Judiciary Committee with the very extensive hearings that we had on this bill, the INS was not inquired of this particular proposal. I gather that is the fact as well.

Now, I would like to ask, as a practical fact, how would this particular amendment work? I am a citizen of the United States. I am unemployed. I lost my job. My unemployment has expired. I am an Anglo. And I walk into the regional office in Boston to apply for a certain kind of welfare benefits. They give me a sheet and they ask me whether I am a citizen. I say yes, I am a citizen, and I sign it. Do I get my benefits under this amendment?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. All right; now I am an Hispanic, I walk in there and they ask me whether I am a citizen of the United States. I know I am a legal resident alien but I am not a citizen, so I say no. Now what happens? Does that individual, who has children at home and a sick member of their family at home, get the benefits?

Mrs. HAWKINS. If he is legal, yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. If I am an Anglo and I say that I am a citizen and I sign it, does anybody investigate whether I am a citizen or not?

Mrs. HAWKINS. No.

Mr. KENNEDY. And if I am Hispanic and I say I am a legal resident alien, not a citizen—I am a legal resident alien—am I investigated?

Mrs. HAWKINS. If you are Hispanic and a U.S. citizen, you are not.

Mr. KENNEDY. You are not investigated.

Mrs. HAWKINS. That is right. We believe you are telling the truth.

Mr. KENNEDY. Now, if I am a legal alien, do I get investigated? I am Hispanic, I am a legal alien. Do I get investigated? I am not a citizen.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Legal?

Mr. KENNEDY. A legal alien.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Yes; your number is checked.

Mr. KENNEDY. So if you are a legal alien, you are admitted, maybe under the refugee laws, you are admitted under the legal procedures of the Immigration Act because, for example, you have married a foreigner, you are legal, you are unemployed and you are a legal, you get investigated. Is that the result?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Not all legal aliens are eligible for benefits, such as students.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am talking about welfare. I am talking about food stamps.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Neither are all citizens eligible for student loan programs.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am well aware of that. But elaborate procedures have to be followed. We are talking about the essentials of life—food.

Mrs. HAWKINS. That is true.

Mr. KENNEDY. So if I am a legal alien and I happen to be Hispanic and I happened to marry an American and I am here legally and I am unemployed and I am poor—if I am Hispanic, under the Senator's amendment, I am automatically investigated.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I do not care if you are Hispanic or Austrian or whatever. You are an alien.

Mr. KENNEDY. Even though I am here legally?

Mrs. HAWKINS. And not a citizen.

Mr. KENNEDY. But I am here legally, married an American. I am unemployed, and that individual signs the card and says, "I am a legal resident alien," but still you run the numbers through the computer. Is that right?

Mrs. HAWKINS. We check the number. You bet.

Mr. KENNEDY. You do not check the citizens, do you? You do not check an American citizen who comes in, do you?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Check them how?

Mr. KENNEDY. You do not run a computer check on a citizen.

Mrs. HAWKINS. No. There is a Social Security number; and on the application for food stamps—we did it in 1981—they say, "We are not lying. We need the food stamps." We check all their data. My State is computerized for all United States-Florida citizens.

Mr. KENNEDY. So we rely on the computers. Is that correct?

Mrs. HAWKINS. We do.

Mr. KENNEDY. Can the Senator from Florida indicate how many legal resident aliens are not on the computers in this country at this time? Can the Senator answer that for me?

Mrs. HAWKINS. I do not know of anybody who can answer that.

Mr. KENNEDY. So you do not know how many legal resident aliens are not in the INS computers, do you? What is going to happen to those people? I am a legal resident alien. They check the number, and I am not on the computer. I have children at home who are hungry. Do I get the benefit, under the Senator's amendment?

Mrs. HAWKINS. If INS cannot respond within a certain time, under the Illinois pilot project, for example, they are presumed to be legal.

Mr. KENNEDY. To get back to my other question: How many legal resident aliens, according to the INS, are not on those computers? The Senator must know that.

Mrs. HAWKINS. It does not matter, because if INS cannot respond, they are going to be able to get them.

Mr. KENNEDY. If they are not on the computer, they have to be checked by hand, under the Senator's amendment. Is that correct?

Mrs. HAWKINS. No.

Mr. KENNEDY. How are you going to check it?

Mrs. HAWKINS. INS checks to see.

Mr. KENNEDY. How does INS check?

Mrs. HAWKINS. INS checks through computers.

Mr. KENNEDY. What if they are not on the computer?

Mrs. HAWKINS. If they are not on the computer, then they have the opportunity to come down in, get their benefit.

Mr. KENNEDY. Who comes down in?

Mrs. HAWKINS. The alien.

Mr. KENNEDY. Comes down in where?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Gets a chance to come down, prove that it is legal.

Mr. KENNEDY. A chance?

Mrs. HAWKINS. An opportunity. Just like a citizen comes down, after we verify all the data on citizens.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator says they check on a citizen——

Mrs. HAWKINS. They check on their data.

Mr. KENNEDY. What is the other data?

Mrs. HAWKINS. If he is unemployed, if he qualifies for AFDC, has 10 children or has 2.

Mr. KENNEDY. How many people go through the system now who fall into that category of not being a citizen and fall into the resident alien category? Clearly, if they are undocumented or are illegal, it is difficult to think that they would go through this process. How many go through it at the present time?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Through what system?

Mr. KENNEDY. Through the welfare system in the country, that we are going to have to prove through the INS that they are not on the computers and INS will have to check by hand.

Mrs. HAWKINS. We do not know, because we do not check it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Can the Senator come back to a response to a question, and that is how many now, according to INS, are resident aliens, legal resident aliens in the United States, who have been let in here as a matter of laws passed in the House and the Senate, signed by the President? They are legal and they are not on those computers. Can the Senator give me any idea of what that number could be?

Mrs. HAWKINS. It does not matter if they can——

Mr. KENNEDY. Can you answer the question? Is the answer that you do not know or do you have a number?

Mrs. HAWKINS. It does not matter.

Mr. KENNEDY. Tell me how many.

Mrs. HAWKINS. We do not know how many.

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, I can help the Senator on that.

Mrs. HAWKINS. This would certainly help.

Mr. KENNEDY. I can help the Senator on that issue, because as of March 25, 1985, Harlin Kiester was the chief of the index systems section, within the Office of Information Systems, Immigration and Naturalization Service, in Washington, DC, and has been an employee for 6 years of the INS. He is chief of the index systems section and is thoroughly knowledgeable about the MIRAC computer system. I will include in the RECORD his entire statement.

He said:

Even if the Government were to modify the program—

The meaning of that word will become self evident—

To retrieve this type of information—

The kind of information the Senator from Florida is talking about—

The data generated by such would be erroneous and misleading. William J. Polli, Chief, Records Operations Section, Records Management Branch, INS, has informed me that there are currently 6.2 million records that have not been entered into the system. This backlog has been increasing steadily since 1979. Even with his personnel attempting to key in the current information, along with a small amount of the backlog, they are unable to keep pace with the current records which are received at a rate of approximately 1.4 million per year. Therefore, even if the program were modified, there is no time frame which contains complete records and any search would yield inaccurate statistics.

If the Senator from Florida wants to offer an amendment to the appropriations bill to ensure that INS can get the funds to get this kind of information, put me on as a cosponsor.

I have worked with the INS over a period of years, and it is absolutely disgraceful the lack of support this body gives to them in terms of modernizing their information systems.

I have fought as a member of the Judiciary Committee and as chairman of the Judiciary Committee to give them adequate resources to do the job. But whenever we come on the floor of the U.S. Senate, the reply is, give them more border patrol but do not give the people working in service programs of the INS the kind of support they need. I would welcome the opportunity to work with the Senator from Florida to develop an informational base within INS to do the job she wants. I shall work with the Senator from Florida, I shall work with the chairman of the subcommittee to have the kind of hearings and fashion the kind of program that can achieve the objective of the Senator from Florida. But, Mr. President, I just fail to see how this amendment can be effective under existing circumstances.

Instead, I think it opens enormous opportunities for incredible abuses. I fail to see, with the people around this country who are interested in defrauding the Government because they are undocumented aliens and they are trying to cheat on the system, why they just would not write on their little card that they are a citizen so they do not get investigated.

The Senator from Florida has indicated that. You walk in, you are an undocumented alien, you are trimming on the system, you walk in there and fill that card out and say, "I am a citizen." So you get your benefits, no questions asked. It just is, I think, an ineffective way and subject to all kinds of abuse.

Mr. President, we can take more time going through this in terms of its particular application and how the procedure will work, but I think on the basis of this debate, it has not the support of the INS at this time, it has not the support of the Department of Justice. The fact remains that those who have the primary responsibility for the computer system say they cannot even keep up with the current backlog, they are well behind on legal and resident aliens. I think the system at this time is unworkable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Harlin M. Keister, Jr.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECLARATION OF HARLIN M. KEISTER, JR.

I, Harlin M. Keister, declare and say:

1. My name is Harlin M. Keister, Jr. and I am Chief of the Index System Section, within the Office of Information Systems, Immigration and Naturalization Service [INS], Central Office, 425 I Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20536. I have been an employee of INS for 6 years.

2. In my capacity as Chief of the Index Systems Section I am thoroughly knowledgeable about the MIRAC computer system.

3. MIRAC is programmed to retrieve individual files after an A number, or name and date of birth has been entered onto the system. The current program will not permit the user to enter the dates 1967 and up and then receive instructions to search for apprehensions within a set time frame.

4. In order for MIRAC to accomplish a search of this type the program would have to be modified. It would cost approximately $4,500 to modify the program in-house, to monitor the program's execution, and computer resource expenses. It would cost approximately $9,000 if the Government were to hire a contractor for this purpose. Additionally, it is estimated that it would take approximately 1 month to modify the program in-house and produce the requested statistics. It would take much longer than a month for a contractor to produce the statistics.

5. Even if the Government were to modify the program to retrieve this type of information, the data generated by such would be erroneous and misleading. William J. Polli, Chief, Records Operations Section, Records Management Branch, INS, has informed me that there are currently 6.2 million records that have not been entered into the system. This backlog has been increasing steadily since 1979. Even with his personnel attempting to key in the current information, along with a small amount of the backlog, they are unable to keep pace with the current records which are received at a rate of approximately 1.4 million per year. Therefore, even if the program were modified, there is no time frame which contains complete records and any search would yield inaccurate statistics.

I declare and swear under the penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

HARLIN M. KEISTER, JR.,
Chief, Index System Section.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I shall welcome the chance to work with the Senator from Florida on a better approach. At this time, Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Florida on the table, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Florida on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD], are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 59—as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 178 Leg.]

YEAS—31

Andrews	Harkin	Mitchell
Biden	Hart	Moynihan
Chafee	Hatfield	Packwood
Chiles	Inouye	Pell
Cranston	Kennedy	Proxmire
Danforth	Kerry	Sarbanes
Dodd	Lautenberg	Simon
Eagleton	Leahy	Simpson
Evans	Levin	Weicker
Gore	Mathias
Gorton	Metzenbaum

NAYS—59

Abdnor	Gramm	Nickles

Goldwater	Murkowski

NOT VOTING—10

Cochran	Ford	Pryor
Cohen	Garn	Stafford
Durenberger	Kassebaum
East	Matsunaga

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment (No. 600) was rejected.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 602 TO AMENDMENT NO. 600

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate regarding the separation of Social Security Trust Funds from the Unified Federal Budget)

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ], for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. DENTON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. WILSON, proposes an amendment numbered 602 to amendment numbered 600.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. WARNER. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The clerk will continue to read the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

SEC. . POLICY TOWARD SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) public confidence in the Social Security system has been undermined by the acrimonious debates over deficit reduction;

(2) including Social Security Trust Funds in the Unified Federal Budget masks the true size of the federal deficit;

(3) Social Security is wholly funded by a separate payroll tax, is running a surplus, and does not contribute to the federal deficit;

(4) it is time to protect the integrity of both the Social Security program and the federal budget process by separating the two; and

(5) removing Social Security Trust Funds from the Unified Federal Budget will enable Congress to proceed with the responsibility of solving our massive budget deficit.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Senate that Congress should separate the Social Security Trust Funds from the Unified Federal Budget at the earliest possible date.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. DOMENICI. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). Objection is heard.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEINZ addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, in an effort to try to expedite matters on this bill, I am going to withdraw my amendment temporarily. I will be offering it later in the day. It is a sense-of-the-Senate amendment that the Social Security Trust Funds be separated from, as President Reagan has requested, the unified Federal budget. I will be offering that amendment later on today. So, Mr. President, the yeas and nays have not been ordered on my amendment, and I therefore withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right. The amendment is withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 603

(Purpose: To make the effective dates of certain verification procedures subject to findings in a GAO report)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], proposes an amendment numbered 603:

At the end of subsection (c) of the amendment, add the following new paragraph:

(4) Such sums as may be necessary are authorized for the Immigration and Naturalization Service to carry out the purposes of this section.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to provide sufficient authorization so that we can ensure resources are available to make sure that INS computers are adequate to respond to the demands of this amendment. We will have time hopefully in the Judiciary Committee and in the Immigration Subcommittee, working with the Senator from Florida, to provide a figure that is realistic and we will make our efforts with the Appropriations Committee as well. But it does seem, now that the Senate has decided to go forward with this approach, that we ought to provide sufficient resources to obtain accurate statistics to achieve the objectives of the amendment. I have talked with the Senator from Florida. She appears to be agreeable to this proposal, as is the chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, the Senator from Wyoming. I hope the Senate will accept the amendment.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I agree.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that is quite acceptable to this floor manager.

Mr. KENNEDY. Finally, Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Florida whether it is her intention and view that under this program if an alien applicant—a lawful permanent resident alien—is not found to be included in the INS computer, that within 10 days that person should automatically receive the benefits to which he may be entitled.

In other words, simply because his name may not appear in the INS computer, he won't be penalized or denied benefits he is entitled to?

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I appreciate the concerns raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. The INS has informed me that it has been their experience in States with which they have agreements to presume that the alien is qualified if after a reasonable period of time the INS is unable, for one reason or another, to respond. I agree that this is a practical and useful approach to ensure that no one is denied a benefit or has their benefits unduly delayed as a result of the shortcomings of INS. It is my view that this is a reasonable precaution, and I hope and fully expect the INS to continue to encourage States to accept these kinds of reasonable precautions to ensure that people are not harmed as a result of a problem with INS or its data base.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would also like to share with the Senate an analysis and comment on project SAVE prepared by the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEXICAN AMERICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND,
Washington, DC, March 13, 1985.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: I am enclosing a copy of a letter sent to INS Commissioner Alan Nelson regarding MALDEF's position on Project SAVE (Systematic Alien Verification for Entitlements). As you may recall, Commissioner Nelson indicated during his testimony on the INS Budget Hearings that MALDEF had participated in a press conference and supported the implementation of Project SAVE in Illinois.

In consulting with our Chicago office, a MALDEF attorney did attend the press conference, but did not participate in it, nor did MALDEF endorse the project. Moreover, it is clear that Project SAVE raises a number of problems and questions which are detailed in our letter to Commissioner Nelson.

Therefore, I would like to request that our letter to the Commissioner be included in the record of INS Budget Oversight Hearings. Any inquiries you could make regarding the questions raised by our letter would also be appreciated.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. If you have any further questions, please feel free to give me a call.

Sincerely,

HELEN C. GONZALES,
Associate Counsel.

MEXICAN AMERICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND,
Washington, DC, March 13, 1985.

Commissioner ALAN C. NELSON,
Immigration and Naturalization Service, Washington, DC.

DEAR COMMISSIONER NELSON: Recently Richard Fajardo, a MALDEF staff attorney, had occasion to hear your presentation during the INS budget oversight hearings before Senator Simpson's Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy. During your presentation you indicated that MALDEF had participated in a press conference in support of the announced implementation of Project SAVE (Systematic Alien Verification for Entitlements) in Illinois.

I have consulted with our Chicago office and have learned that at no time has MALDEF endorsed Project SAVE. Thus, I am writing to clarify MALDEF's position for the record. First, while we did attend the December, 1984 press conference, MALDEF did not participate in it. Moreover, in a short meeting after the conference, our Chicago attorney indicated to Illinois and INS officials that we would not support Project SAVE since implementation of the program has resulted in the denial of benefits to legal resident aliens fully entitled to such benefits. Finally, the project SAVE program appears to be in violation of an existing court order issued in Roman-Ramirez v. Bernardi, 82-C-2539 (1982).

Allow me to provide further details. In 1982, the INS began a prototype of Project SAVE in Illinois. The Illinois' Department of Labor (Ill DOL) was requested to refer the names of non-citizen applicants for unemployment compensation benefits to INS for verification of the applicants' immigration status. Aliens whose records could not be found within the INS computers were requested to appear at INS offices to clarify their status. Meanwhile, the Ill DOL denied unemployment benefits to aliens whose status were in question.

As a result of these practices, numerous permanent resident aliens, fully entitled to benefits, were being denied such benefits. MALDEF filed a class action suit in federal court on behalf of such immigrants. Roman-Ramirez, supra. A court order was issued which required:

(1) Benefits will not be denied an alien unless the unemployment claims adjudicator receives written confirmation from the INS that the green card, or other identification presented, is counterfeit or belongs to someone other than the claimant;

(2) If the INS delays in providing a written response, benefits will be issued in the same amount of time as for any other claimant, i.e., U.S. citizen or permanent resident.

(3) Under no circumstances will claimants be required to obtain INS verification on their own, i.e., the burden is on the Ill DOL and the INS to determine whether or not the alien is undocumented, hence ineligible for benefits.

The Court also ordered that Ill DOL provide to INS a list of persons who had been denied unemployment compensation benefits. The INS was required to reverify its records for all persons designated, and such review was to be made "in the best available method and . . . will not rely exclusively on its computer check without a further manual review of its files in the Chicago District Office, as well as a review of the appropriate INS Office which would have the most accurate information for each applicant." Roman-Ramirez, supra. Agreed Order, Judgement and Decree (Oct. 1,1982) (emphasis added). A reverification of records for 600 aliens who had been denied unemployment benefits and who failed to appeal their denials indicated sixty two aliens (10 percent) had been improperly classified as undocumented aliens, and so were improperly denied benefits.

A manual search of INS records is especially important because, as a GAO report found, it is not clear whether persons for whom no computer records are found or who fail to appear at INS offices to clarify their immigration status are actually undocumented. A 1979 GAO review of a California Alien Verification Program made the following findings:

The INS offices in California initially identified 24 illegal aliens from local records and 112 aliens who "failed to appear" for a total of 136 who were thus denied benefits by the State of California. INS headquarters personnel, at our request, researched additional records maintained in Washington, D.C. and the following was found.

Of the 24 illegal aliens, 6 were determined to be legal, 3 illegal, and no records were found for 15.

Of the 112 aliens who "failed to appear," 44 were determined to be legal, 2 illegal, and 66 with no record.

In summary, out of a total of 136 aliens who were denied public assistance benefits after a search by INS of local records in California, 50 were later determined by INS to be legal, 5 illegal, and 81 with no records through a search of additional records maintained in Washington, DC.

INS—Records Management Problems: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Information and Individual Rights of the House Committee on Government Operations, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 578-79 (1979) (Appendix 25—Correspondence on GAO review of California's Alien Verification Program. Letter dated November 7, 1979 from GAO to the Subcommittee) (emphasis in the original).

The GAO report on the California project indicates that there is a strong likelihood that a substantial number of persons for whom no immigration records can be found are in fact legal residents. Thus, it is wrong to assume that persons whose records fail to appear in the INS computer files and who fail to appear before INS officials to clarify their status are undocumented aliens.

Unlike the Roman-Ramirez Court Order which requires a reverification, including manual searches, of aliens who were misidentified as undocumented aliens, Project SAVE only provides for a search of INS computer records. Where a record of immigration status is not found the alien is asked to appear before INS offices to clarify his or her status. This appears to place the burden on the individual to prove or clarify his or her status. SAVE does not provide for manual searches for records not found in INS computer files, although such searches may locate the records of many individuals and prevent delays or denials of benefits to persons eligible for them.

Let me also restate for the record that MALDEF did not participate in the December, 1984 press conference in which Governor Thompson and INS officials announced the implementation of Project SAVE. MALDEF's Chicago office was invited to attend the press conference and was told that Illinois and INS officials would announce a program to implement the 1982 Roman-Ramirez court order. However, the press conference presentations described a project which did not appear to implement the Roman-Ramirez court order. We informed Illinois and INS officials that we were not satisfied with the presentations made and we would have to investigate the program further.

It is quite apparent that Project SAVE will result in the delay or denial of benefits to many legal resident aliens, including many Hispanics. In addition, to the extent that only a small percentage of persons for whom records could not initially be located are later found to be undocumented aliens, the savings to participating states are overstated or will be a result of withholding benefits to persons who are legally entitled to such benefits.

In addition, the program raises other questions not elaborated above, including privacy issues (i.e., the propriety of gathering information about aliens and allowing state agencies access to such information) and discrimination in implementation (e.g., to what extent are all entitlement applicants required to submit to the immigration status checks, or are status checks limited to aliens and naturalized citizens, aliens only, or only certain ethnic minorities, etc.).

In closing, let me reiterate that MALDEF did not participate in the Chicago press conference, and we have not endorsed Project SAVE.

Sincerely,

HELEN C. GONZALES,
Associate Counsel.

PROJECT SAVE

The INS has initiated a Systematic Alien Verification for Entitlements program (project SAVE) to identify undocumented aliens seeking state and federal entitlements or services. However, a number of problems have surfaced in implementation of various pilot programs, in that some permanent resident aliens and naturalized citizens entitled to benefits were being denied such benefits.

1. What is Project SAVE?

The INS has started a new operation to identify undocumented aliens: Project SAFE. The INS will grant state agencies access to INS computer records. When a person applies for social services, such as unemployment compensation, AFDC, medical care, etc., a persons name is compared with INS computer records to check the applicants' immigration status.

The INS is promoting the program as a way for state governments to save money, since the state will not have to provide benefits to ineligible undocumented aliens.

2. How are undocumented aliens identified?

When a person applies for benefits, state personnel will access INS computer records and check the applicant's immigration status.

If no record of lawful U.S. entry exists in the INS computers, the person is sent a letter asking them to appear at the INS office to clarify their immigration status.

Persons for whom no record is found and who "fail to appear" to clarify their status are assumed to be undocumented and are denied benefits or social services.

3. I understand that because INS records are incomplete, legal residents have been incorrectly identified as undocumented, and so, are denied benefits.

A. You indicate in your testimony, that about 35 million persons are entered into you computer records. What kind of information is kept in these computer records?

Does this include only legal resident aliens? If so, does it include all legal resident aliens? If not, what percentage of aliens are included?

Do these records include aliens and naturalized citizens? If not, how are problems or questions regarding a naturalized citizen's status resolved?

B. What is the earliest date of entry recorded in INS computers?

Apparently, INS computer records do not include data for persons who legally entered the United States prior to 1972 (approximately). In any case, persons who entered in 1960 would not be in the INS data base.

C. What is the most recent date of entry recorded in the INS computers?

The names of persons who legally entered the United States most recently are not in the INS computer. Apparently, it takes about 1 year to enter such data in INS records.

4. As a result of such gaps in INS computer records, weren't a number of legal residents erroneously identified as undocumented and thus disqualified from receiving benefits to which they were entitled?

Yes. For example, in Illinois a pilot SAVE program to identify undocumented aliens who were applying for unemployment compensation benefits resulted in delays or denials of such benefits to legal resident aliens. A manual reverification of records for about 600 aliens who had been denied unemployment benefits and who failed to appeal their denials indicated sixty two aliens (10 percent) had been improperly classified as undocumented aliens, and so were improperly denied benefits.

5. In 1979, a GAO review of a California alien verification program found the following:

That of 24 aliens identified as illegal by INS, a further record search found that 6 were legal, 3 illegal and no records were found for 15.

A similar reverification of records for 112 persons who had "failed to appear" to clear up their immigration status, found that 44 were legal, 2 illegal, and 66 with no record. Unfortunately, all 112 had been denied benefits prior to the additional record search.

Can you assure this subcommittee that INS is conducting the additional record searches necessary to protect legal residents?

Note.—This GAO report suggests that there is a strong likelihood that a substantial number of persons for whom no immigration records can be found are in fact legal residents.

Thus, it appears erroneous for the INS to assume that persons for whom records do not appear in the INS computer files and who fail to appear before INS officials to clarify their status are undocumented.

5. Didn't an Illinois Federal court require the INS to provide for manual searches of records not found in the INS computer files?

Yes. In Roman-Ramirez versus Bernardi, the INS identified a number of persons who applied for unemployment compensation benefits as undocumented. The court required the INS to reverify its records for all persons denied benefits, and the review was to be made "in the best available method and . . . will not rely exclusively on its computer check without further manual review of its files in the Chicago District Office, as well as a review of the appropriate INS Office which would have the most accurate information for each applicant."

After the INS instituted the Federal court-ordered procedure, it was found that about 10 percent of those said to be undocumented were in fact documented aliens (62/600).

6. How did you calculate the cost saving to the country of some $10 billion?

I understand INS estimated cost savings of $58 million in unemployment compensation benefits to the State of Illinois, is that correct? If so, how were these cost savings calculated?

INS probably made estimates as follows:

(1) Did one week survey in an area with heavily concentrated Hispanic population.

(2) Estimated the number of persons identified as undocumented.

(3) Assumed each would receive the maximum amount of benefits.

(4) Extrapolated cost over a 1-year period (unemployed persons only receive 26 weeks of benefits.)

(5) Extrapolated similar savings to all Illinois offices.

Problems with estimates:

(1) Not all communities will have the same number of undocumented aliens.

(2) Not all persons will be entitled to same amount of benefits.

(3) Persons can only receive benefits for 26 weeks.

QUESTIONS ON THE SYSTEMATIC ALIEN VERIFICATION FOR ENTITLEMENTS PROGRAM (SAVE)

(1) Please list all state, local, and federal agencies which are currently participating in systematic alien verification through use of computer matching and cross-indexing, including all cases involving so-called "routine use exceptions" to the Privacy Act.

In verifying eligibility of applicants for entitlements, exactly what information does INS release to state and local agencies?

(2) INS estimates that cost avoidances of $10.708 billion are potentially achievable through nationwide implementation of the SAVE Program.

Please explain estimates used by INS analysts in calculating cost avoidances related to the SAVE Program, specifically with respect to the average dollar amount per unentitled user, assumed rates of entitlement usage by undocumented immigrants, and estimates of the number of undocumented aliens residing in the U.S.

(3) It is our understanding that SAVE verification processes depend entirely on state and local agencies' access to applicants' "A" file numbers.

Please explain in detail the status of INS automated "A" files, and their use in the SAVE Program, specifically with respect to;

Estimated totals of aliens who have "A" numbers which, due to pre-1972 or post-1984 issuance dates, reportedly may not be included in INS' automated files, nationally, and for each District Office.

Numbers of permanent resident aliens whose "A" numbers were not available through computer search, but who have been subsequently determined to be eligible for entitlements after manual searches of files at the National, office, District office, or port-of-entry.

Status of asylees, refugees, and other aliens residing in the United States "under color of law" do not have INS "A" numbers. In these cases, how do SAVE operations in various locales alternatively verify these legally eligible aliens' status?

(4) Reports on SAVE operations indicate that, at least in some instances, non-citizens whose "A" numbers cannot be located through computer checks must, upon appearance at INS District Offices, file a G-641 information request form to verify their eligibility for entitlements.

Please provide information on the use of G-641 forms in SAVE operations, the average duration of G-641 information searches nationally and by District Office, and the District Offices' policies regarding G-641 fee collection related to SAVE verification requests.

(5) INS reports that, in pilot projects testing SAVE operations, approximately 90 percent of applicants referred to INS District Offices because of questionable eligibility status "failed to appear."

Are referred aliens who fail to appear denied entitlements in all cases? Please provide all available information on the rates of such failures of appearance among referred aliens, as well as INS estimates of the number of such aliens who are determined not to be eligible for entitlements. In addition, please provide any and all data on the number of "failed to appear" aliens who may be eligible for such entitlements, but who decide not to follow through with the verification process.

(6) Descriptions of the SAVE program suggest that only those applicants who identify themselves as non-citizens go through the verification procedures.

Are either state or INS officials afforded the discretion to require proof of citizenship of applicants who identify themselves as citizens? Please provide information on the number of citizens, or applicants who identify themselves as citizens, who have gone through the SAVE verification procedures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

So the amendment (No. 603) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida, as amended by the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida, as amended by the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment (No. 600), as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 604

(Purpose: To terminate provisions relating to the unlawful employment of aliens if the Comptroller General reports that certain adverse conditions have resulted from carrying out such provisions)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] proposes an amendment numbered 604.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 118, line 14, strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "three".

On page 119, line 11, strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "three".

On page 121, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

(d) TERMINATION DATE FOR EMPLOYER SANCTIONS.—(1) The provisions of section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall terminate 30 calendar days after receipt of the last report required to be transmitted under subsection (b), if—

(A) the Comptroller General determines, and so reports in such report, that a widespread pattern of discrimination has resulted against citizens or nationals of the United States or against eligible workers seeking employment, the sole result of the implementation of employer sanctions; and

(B) there is enacted, within such period of 30 calendar days, a joint resolution stating in substance that the Congress approves the findings of the Comptroller General contained in such report.

(2) Any joint resolution referred to in clause (B) of paragraph (1) shall be considered in the Senate in accordance with subsection (f).

(e) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—For the purpose of expediting the consideration and adoption of joint resolutions under subsection (d), a motion to proceed to the consideration of any such joint resolution after it has been reported by the appropriate committee shall be treated as highly privileged in the House of Representatives.

(f) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES IN THE SENATE.—(1) For purposes of subsection (d), the continuity of a session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the period indicated.

(2) Paragraphs (3) and (4) of this subsection are enacted—

(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and as such they are deemed a part of the rules of the Senate, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in the Senate in the case of joint resolutions referred to in subsection (d), and supersede other rules of the Senate only to the extent that such paragraphs are inconsistent therewith; and

(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of the Senate to change such rules at any time, in the same manner as in the case of any other rule of the Senate.

(3)(A) If the committee of the Senate to which has been referred a joint resolution relating to the report described in subsection (d) has not reported such joint resolution at the end of the ten calendar days after its introduction, not counting any day which is excluded under paragraph (1) of this subsection, it is in order to move either to discharge the committee from further consideration of the joint resolution or to discharge the committee from further consideration of any other joint resolution introduced with respect to the same report which has been referred to the committee, except that no motion to discharge shall be in order after the committee has reported a joint resolution with respect to the same report.

(B) A motion to discharge under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph may be made only by a Senator favoring the joint resolution, is privileged, and debate thereon shall be limited to not more than 1 hour, to be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the joint resolution, the time to be divided equally between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees. An amendment to the motion is not in order, and it is not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(4)(A) A motion in the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution shall be privileged. An amendment to the motion shall not be in order, nor shall it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(B) Debate in the Senate on a joint resolution, and all debatable motions and appeals in connection therewith, shall be limited to not more than 10 hours, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees.

(C) Debate in the Senate on any debatable motion or appeal in connection with a joint resolution shall be limited to not more than 1 hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the joint resolution, except that in the event the manager of the joint resolution is in favor of any such motion or appeal, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from time under their control on the passage of a joint resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any debatable motion or appeal.

(D) A motion in the Senate to further limit debate on a joint resolution, debatable motion, or appeal is not debatable. No amendment to, or motion to recommit, a joint resolution is in order in the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the central objections that has been raised again and again over this legislation—both during the extensive subcommittee hearings we have conducted over the past 4 years, as well as during the debates in both the Senate and House of Representatives—is the concern that the new employer sanctions authorized in this bill might result in job discrimination against certain American workers.

I stress the word "might," because we really don't know, and it is certainly not intended nor anticipated by the sponsors of this legislation. But the fears are real, and they are based upon bitter experience by many in our society—particularly by our Hispanic and Asian citizens. These are fears that I believe we simply cannot ignore.

The amendment I have sent to the desk is an effort to address these fears and to assure that Congress will act to rectify employer sanctions if a widespread pattern of job discrimination should develop in their implementation.

This amendment simply offers a guarantee, built into the statute, that Congress can act expeditiously to rectify any unintended discrimination. If, contrary to all the protections and intentions contained in the bill, new job discrimination does develop—and not just a few isolated cases of discrimination, but a widespread pattern of discrimination—then Congress can sunset employer sanctions.

If such a pattern of discrimination were to develop, I can't imagine that Congress wouldn't want to act. But unfortunately, Mr. President, the history of immigration laws tells us that once Congress acts on immigration, it is often decades before it acts again. And when there has been the potential for discrimination in our immigration laws, we know that discrimination has developed.

I spelled out the history of that in my opening statement 2 days ago.

So in fairness to those minority members of our society—who will surely be the most directly affected by the provisions of this legislation—we ought to deal with their fears of discrimination now, and not wait until after they develop and without any easy statutory mechanism to deal with them.

My amendment offers this assurance and a statutory guarantee that Congress can easily address the issue of discrimination should it arise.

It simply requires the General Accounting Office to undertake an independent study each year of the implementation of employer sanctions to determine if a pattern of discrimination has resulted. At the end of the third year, if the GAO finds that a widespread pattern of discrimination has developed over that period, it makes that determination to Congress.

Then Congress—both Houses—has the opportunity, through the expedited 30-day procedure, to adopt a joint resolution stating in substance that it approves the findings of the GAO, whereupon employer sanctions are terminated until Congress reenacts them with proper safeguards.

If the GAO does not find a pattern of discrimination, or if Congress disapproves of the GAO findings—or even ignores them—then employer sanctions will continue.

But, Mr. President, it is hard for me to imagine either the Senate or the House failing to exercise the expedited parliamentary procedures offered in this amendment if the GAO does find a widespread pattern of discrimination. This legislative mechanism is the minimum assurance we should be willing to provide to those in our society who are understandably worried over the implementation of employer sanctions.

We dealt with this issue in the Judiciary Committee during the markup. This type of approach has been offered by me and other members of the Judiciary Committee a number of times. We have modified our approach to consider the various objections to previous amendments.

I have offered this type of amendment on each immigration bill that has been before us. It seems to me that it provides the minimum guarantee we should be willing to make.

I have had a chance to talk this over with the floor manager of the bill. He is very familiar with the approach that has been included in this amendment, and I welcome his observations about it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it is important for me to be able to say succinctly that this is quite acceptable to me, and let me explain why, in this context.

We all know that employer sanctions is the very key to immigration reform. There is no immigration reform, at least on the humane basis that Senator KENNEDY and I have tried to do it, without employer sanctions. No one has been more concerned about the possibility of employer sanctions perhaps causing new employment discrimination. Every one of us has been deeply concerned about that. That has been my abiding concern for 6 years. It was the abiding concern of the Select Commission. We all share that view.

We have examined that single issue in more than a dozen hearings which the subcommittee has held in the past 4½ years on that point alone. We examined the record of employment discrimination in the other Western countries of the world which have employer sanctions laws, and most do. We have read the GAO report which says that they do not work, and they do not work when they are just the cost of doing business. They work when they are tough, hard, and serious, and that is what we have in S. 1200; a cease and desist order, civil penalties, and up to $2,000 for the first offense, up to $5,000 for the second offense, up to $10,000 for the third offense. Finally, the egregious person who never wakes up and smells the coffee is faced with possibly a criminal sentence. Criminal sentences do not come in until you get to the repeat pattern or practice offender. That is the key to employer sanctions.

We never did really find substantial evidence that this bill alone would in any way increase employment discrimination; yet, it remains a well-founded concern even in my bosom. Nonetheless, we included in the bill provisions which assure close monitoring.

I hope everyone is aware of how much time we spent on that issue in trying to determine whether there was some kind of new employment discrimination.

By this bill, we involve the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, and the Department of Justice in this monitoring process that is in S. 1200, as well as the GAO watchdog agency.

Congress is required to hold hearings within 60 days of the receipt of any report of a pattern of employment discrimination resulting from employer sanctions—and to discuss the legislative remedies. I think that is the essence of this amendment. It is the important part of it. We are looking at discrimination based solely on employer sanctions; and if that is there, we want to do something. It is not even quite a sunset. There is an expedited process which will be carried out, and I think it is important to know that it is a parliamentary process and we will do it.

Senator KENNEDY and I have spent a great deal of time trying to assure nondiscrimination. I believe it was full and very adequate protection against new employment discrimination. However—and this is the reason why I support and will accept the amendment—I am fully aware of the fears, rational or irrational, of some, especially in the Hispanic community and the civil rights community, that somehow new discrimination might occur. That is not my desire or my intent or my objective.

Again, we are not talking about discrimination based on alienage. That will be visited at a later part of the day. But I do not believe that immigration reform legislation is a proper vehicle for civil rights legislation, and that is what did occur in the House and the conference committee last year. There were provisions presented then about employment and discrimination in EEOC and a new agency of Government fashioned on the NLRB and those things which I do not think were appropriate because they never even passed when we debated the civil rights laws of 1964 and 1972.

So, I think Senator KENNEDY's amendment provides the protections that are sought by all of us concerned about discrimination without inserting a whole new concept of civil rights legislation into the bill. I deeply appreciate that, because I think that would be a tough one to hurdle if it got in there. I think Senator KENNEDY shares some of that concern, that we need not go to a new agency of Government. If that happens, I, and I think everyone else in this Chamber, believe that we would want to have a swift and expedited manner to address discrimination problems. I think Senator KENNEDY's 30-day expedited procedures for Congress to act is appropriate, and I accept it. In doing so, I assert that civil rights legislation should appear separately from an immigration reform bill, especially when we have tried so desperately to protect minorities in this country, and in this bill.

With that, I thank Senator KENNEDY for being a remarkable, positive force throughout. I do not want widespread discrimination to occur. If it does occur through employer sanctions, we shall trigger an expedited procedure instead of a whole new agency of Government that has never survived the legislative process. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I thank the chairman of our Immigration Subcommittee for his support of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion? The Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment, but I would like to make some further points about the question of sanctions itself. I think that what the Senator from Massachusetts is doing certainly improves the situation of the way the bill is written in its current form. I think what we have to recognize is that what is happening with this legislation is the employer sanctions provisions are an attempt to halt illegal immigration into the United States and try to transfer the responsibility for law enforcement from the Government over to the private sector.

I know that some have sincerely argued that the sanctions in this bill, which include both civil fines up to $10,000, Mr. President, and criminal fines up to $3,000 and 6 months' imprisonment for employers hiring illegal workers, will in no way lead to discrimination based upon the ethnic group, race, or skin color. But I believe such discrimination will increase in two ways should these sanctions be passed.

I realize that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is going to allow for a study. If I understand the bill correctly, and I think the distinguished chairman can correct me if I am wrong, in the first year, there will not be sanctions imposed on employers so there will be an opportunity for people to ease into this. I think that is a plus, and compliment the Senator from Wyoming for having that in the bill. But I think that we have to recognize what is going to happen, and I shall just quote from the Heritage Foundation Issue Bulletin:

(1) Efforts to enforce existing antidiscrimination laws would be hindered by giving employers a first line of defense against accusations of discrimination. If a Mexican, for example, were to bring a case against a firm, the employer simply could state that he suspected the Mexican of being an illegal immigrant.

I think that is something we have to look very carefully at.

(2) Even law-abiding employers would tend to discriminate unwittingly against the foreign born in their "good faith efforts" to comply with the law. Foreigners would be transformed into a suspect class of workers; employers would thus scrutinize their credentials more thoroughly than those of other workers and make summary judgments regarding their legality.

I think that question is one that certainly legal scholars and the judiciary branch are going to have to look at. I personally believe lawyers are going to have a field day in discrimination cases if the sanctions are left in this legislation. I hope we will get them out of the legislation if we expect to have a workable bill.

It is only reasonable to assume that a potential employer will respond in this manner to Federal immigration legislation, particularly legislation such as this which provides for criminal penalties against employers. As the above-mentioned Heritage Bulletin states:

Time magazine recently reported that merely the prospect of a sanctions bill has "excited something resembling panic among many employers. A few factories in the Los Angeles area are already laying off workers they suspect may be in the U.S. illegally."

Mr. President, that may appeal to some people who read that article, but what it says to me is a Hispanic-born U.S. citizen who gets caught in this suspect situation could have a very difficult time obtaining gainful employment if this discrimination becomes rampant.

Although illegal immigration is a legitimate concern, and an area in which our policy must be reformed, our national immigration policy must not jeopardize the welfare of our own citizens.

I simply cannot condone or agree with the portion of this bill that assumes the employer sanctions can somehow answer this problem.

A second problem arises under such sanctions: employers are forced to become police officers. The sanctions shift onto business the burden of enforcing our immigration laws. We already have a governmental agency, the Immigration and Naturalization Service [INS], which is properly charged with preventing entry of illegal immigrants into the United States. Yet, while retaining that agency and its border patrols, this legislation essentially forces upon employers the responsibility of halting undocumented immigration.

We are asking American business men and women to carry out a responsibility that properly belongs to the Federal Government. By shifting the burden of this responsibility to the private sector, the Government is forsaking its duty to the public.

Sanctions such as these will hamper economic activity and growth because of this shift of responsibility and its resulting stringent requirements. When hiring new workers, businesses must take two steps under this bill: First, examine each job applicant's documents to verify that the applicant is a legal worker; and second, maintain records and documents for up to 5 years on each employee hired if a business hires more than three workers. As the Heritage Bulletin points out:

The law would apply equally to Wall Street banks hiring Harvard MBAs and to California hotels hiring bellboys and dishwashers. While [the bill] technically would make this optional, in fact, failure to keep employee records would constitute a legal presumption of guilt for businesses discovered to have an illegal alien in their employment.

Not only are we asking employers to become police officers when a Federal agency already exists to enforce our immigration policy, we are also creating for them a set of verification and paperwork requirements which go beyond the onerous. This will have a drastic effect on every part of the business sector.

Additionally, the small businessmen and women of Idaho and the Nation will be harmed disproportionately by these sanctions because, as the Small Business Administration stated in its 1984 report, "The State of Small Business," small business' percentage of Hispanic workers is almost twice that of large businesses: 6.5 percent as compared to 3.5 percent. As the Heritage Bulletin accurately states:

Because Hispanics are more likely than other workers to arouse INS suspicion, small businesses would be subject to greater harassment. Thus even small businesses with impeccable hiring practices would need to devote a greater proportion of their resources than the typical large firm to protecting themselves against prosecution.

These, Mr. President, are the reasons for which I must strongly oppose the employer sanctions provisions included in S. 1200. I do not mean, however, to detract from the untiring and courageous efforts of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] where he has made a good faith effort to pass needed immigration reform. I commend Senator SIMPSON for his hard work to improve the Nation's immigration policy, and I look forward to working with him to make sure all issues are addressed fairly in this legislation.

We must ensure, however, that U.S. immigration laws do not encourage discrimination against particular ethnic groups, that the Federal Government carries out its responsibility to enforce these laws, and that we do not hamper economic activity and growth by creating onerous burdens on employers through recordkeeping and verification requirements.

I know what will happen with many small businesses. Simply, in my opinion, I think the research will show what will happen. I know that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is making a good faith effort here.

I think it would be better to take these out on the front end right now and look at what we think will happen based on past performances. I think it would be much better to take the sanctions out now.

I can also count votes, and I think the Senator from Wyoming probably has the votes to keep the sanctions in.

But I believe we are going to rue the day that these sanctions are imposed in this bill and it is going to hurt the very people in the United States, some of the people we wish to help with the passage of this legislation.

I know many people personally in the Hispanic group who are U.S. citizens. They will be the ones who will feel the pain of discrimination when some small businesses and large businesses alike have individuals who in order to protect themselves from the threat of $10,000 fine simply will not hire anyone of a Hispanic origin that they have the slightest suspicion of who may be an illegal entrant into the United States.

I think that is most unfortunate. I think we should make serious consideration of still striking this entire sanctions section from the bill. It is not workable. It is totally in conflict with the civil rights legislation that we have put on the books in this great land of ours.

I would hope that before this is over that the least we could do would be to accept the Kennedy amendment, and that is a good start, but I would like to see it even go further than this.

I thank the chairman and I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Idaho and this report also, because indeed it will be important to accept this type of procedure in lieu of something that might not be as workable.

I share only, and then I will conclude, that the employers of America indeed are watching. It is a critical thing to the employers of America, and the most pleasing part of the change of position in these last months has been the U.S. Chamber of Commerce who have embraced this bill now. It was not acceptable to them 2 years ago.

We now have an optional system of verification at first. We do not have a mandatory one. It is something that was fashioned for the employers of America—the Business Roundtable, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the National Federation of Independent Businesses—have all been very supportive and helpful, and they represent some of the largest small businesses in America.

I just share that and, of course, the employers under this bill—those who employ four or less—are less subject to some of the conditions. I share that.

I thank the Senator for his participation.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on that?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. SYMMS. How is the amendment envisioned to work and who is going to decide if discrimination is in fact taking place in the workplace?

Mr. SIMPSON. That will be the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SYMMS. But based on what evidence?

Mr. SIMPSON. That will be on the basis of the reports that are in S. 1200 and the GAO report and a task force.

Mr. SYMMS. To go out in the field and try to make a fair determination?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. SYMMS. In other words, if I have this understanding correct, the first year this is on the books there will be no fines levied on employer sanctions?

Mr. SIMPSON. No.

Mr. President, as to the first year, the first 6 months will be an education period throughout the United States and the second 6 months will be a warning period, and there will be no fines within that period.

Mr. SYMMS. Then beyond the second violation in this period the employer would be fined, that is, in the warning period.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct, after the warning period.

Mr. SYMMS. So once the word gets out on the street, then you would not expect any discrimination the first year, then. But if in fact we get a report back to Congress that there is discrimination taking place, how soon then would the amendment trigger that the employer sanctions section of the bill will be altered or changed, or what will be the response?

Mr. SIMPSON. If we find that employer sanctions alone are responsible for discrimination in the United States?

Mr. SYMMS. Not alone are responsible, but they are making a contribution to it.

Mr. SIMPSON. If there is widespread discrimination caused by employer sanctions, is that what you are saying?

Mr. SYMMS. That is the question.

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. SYMMS. How soon will we get a response?

Mr. SIMPSON. We will have responses from two different ways. We will have the responses under S. 1200 which have to do with monitoring by EEOC, the Civil Rights Commission, that aspect, and then under Senator KENNEDY's amendment here we will have the GAO report and a task force to tell us if this is occurring.

If it is occurring, then there will be an immediate expedited process.

But there will be GAO reports every 18 months and the expedited process under this amendment.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts?

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts which requires Congress to vote on sunsetting employer sanctions in 3 years, if the General Accounting Office finds a widespread pattern of discrimination resulting.

A major concern I have had for the past 3 years as the Senate has attempted to enact immigration reform legislation on three separate occasions is discrimination. More precisely, Mr. President, I feel strongly that Congress must be careful to ensure against the prospect that immigration reform be used as a means to discriminate against Hispanics and other minorities.

One persistent objection to employer sanctions has been the possibility that they could lead to increased discrimination against Hispanics and Asians. Senator KENNEDY's amendment is a reasonable, modest, well thoughtout approach to this problem. I urge its adoption.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment (No. 604) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 605

(Purpose: To substitute provisions regarding the legalization of aliens)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN proposes amendment numbered 605.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Beginning on page 68 with line 7, strike out all through line 7 on page 93 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE II—LEGALIZATION

LEGALIZATION

SEC. 201. (a) Chapter 5 of title II is amended by inserting after section 245 (8 U.S.C. 1255) the following new section:

"§ 245A. "Adjustment of status of certain entrants before January 1, 1981, to that of persons admitted for temporary or permanent residence

"SEC. 245A. (a) The Attorney General may, in his discretion and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, adjust the status of an alien to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if—

"(1) the alien applies for such adjustment during the twelve-month period beginning on a date (not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this section) designated by the Attorney General,

"(2)(A) the alien (other than an alien who entered as a nonimmigrant) establishes that he entered the United States prior to January 1, 1977, and has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1977, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, or

"(B) the alien entered the United States as a nonimmigrant before January 1, 1977, the alien's period of authorized stay as a nonimmigrant expired before Januay 1, 1977, through the passage of time or the alien's unlawful status was known to the Government as of January 1, 1977, and the alien has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1977, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, and

"(C) if the alien was at any time a nonimmigrant exchange alien (as defined in section 101(a)(15)(J)), the alien was not subject to the two-year foreign residence requirement of section 212(e) or has fulfilled that requirement or received a waiver thereof;

"(3) the alien was continuously physically present in the United States since the date of the enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(4) the alien—

"(A) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3),

"(B) has not been convicted of any felony or of three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States,

"(C) has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, and

"(D) registers under the Military Selective Service Act, if the alien is required to be so registered under that Act.

Notwithstanding paragraph (1), an alien who (at any time during the one-year period described in paragraph (1) is the subject of an order to show cause issued under section 242, must make application under such paragraph not later than the end of the thirty-day period beginning either on the first day of such one-year period or on the date of the issuance of such order, whichever day is later. An alien shall not be considered to have failed to maintained continuous physical presence in the United States for purposes of paragraph (3) by virtue of a brief, casual, and innocent absence from the United States.

"(b)(1) The Attorney General may, in his discretion and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, adjust the status of an alien to that of an alien lawfully admitted for temporary residence if—

"(A) the alien applies for such adjustment during the twelve-month period described in subsection (a)(1);

"(B)(i) the alien (other than an alien who entered as a nonimmigrant) establishes that he entered the United States prior to January 1, 1981, and has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1981, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; or

"(ii) the alien entered the United States as a nonimmigrant before January 1, 1981, the alien's period of authorized stay as a nonimmigrant expired before January 1, 1981, through the passage of time or the alien's unlawful status was known to the Government as of January 1, 1981, and the alien has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1981, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(iii) if the alien was at any time a nonimmigrant exchange alien (as defined in section 101(a)(15)(J)), the alien was not subject to the two-year foreign residence requirement of section 212(e) or has fulfilled that requirement or received a waiver thereof;

"(C) the alien has been continuously physically present in the United States since the date of the enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(D) the alien—

"(i) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3),

"(ii) has not been convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States,

"(iii) has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, and

"(iv) registers under the Military Selective Service Act, if the alien is required to be so registered under that Act.

For purposes of this subsection, an alien in the status of a Cuban and Haitian entrant described in paragraph (1) or (2)(A) of section 501(e) of Public Law 96-422 shall be considered to have entered the United States and to be in an unlawful status in the United States. Notwithstanding paragraph (1), an alien who (at any time during the one-year period described in subparagraph (A)) is the subject of an order to show cause issued under section 242, must make application under such paragraph not later than the end of the thirty-day period beginning either on the first day of such one-year period or on the date of the issuance of such order, whichever day is later. An alien shall not be considered to have failed to maintained continuous physical presence in the United States for purposes of subparagraph (C) by virtue of a brief, casual, and innocent absence from the United States.

"(2) During the period an alien is in the lawful temporary resident status granted under paragraph (1)—

"(A) the Attorney General shall, in accordance with regulations, permit the alien to return to the United States after such brief and casual trips abroad as reflect an intention on the part of the alien to adjust to lawful permanent resident status under paragraph (1) and after brief temporary trips abroad occasioned by a family obligation involving an occurrence such as the illness or death of a close relative or other family need, and

"(B) the Attorney General shall grant the alien authorization to engage in employment in the United States and provide to that alien an 'employment authorized' endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(3) The Attorney General, in his discretion and under such regulations as he may prescribe, may adjust the status of any alien provided lawful temporary resident status under paragraph (1) to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if the alien-

"(A) applies for such adjustment during the 12-month period beginning with the first day of the twenty-fifth month that begins after the date the alien was granted such temporary resident status;

"(B) establishes that he has continuously resided in the United States since the date the alien was granted such temporary resident status;

"(C)(1) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3), and

"(ii) has not been convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States; and

"(D) can demonstrate that he either (i) meets the requirements of section 312 (relating to minimal understanding of ordinary English and a knowledge and understanding of the history and government of the United States), or (ii) is satisfactorily pursuing a course of study (recognized by the Attorney General) to achieve such an understanding of English and such a knowledge and understanding of the history and government of the United States. An alien shall not be considered to have lost the continuous residence referred to in subparagraph (B) by reason of an absence from the United States permitted under paragraph (2)(A). The Attorney General may, in his discretion, waive all or part of the requirements of subparagraph (D) in the case of an alien who is 65 years of age or older.

"(4) The Attorney General shall provide for termination of temporary resident status granted an alien under this subsection—

"(A) if it appears to the Attorney General that the alien was in fact not eligible for such status,

"(B) if the alien commits an act that (i) makes the alien inadmissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3), or (ii) is convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States, or

"(C) at the end of the thirty-seventh month beginning after the date the alien is granted such status, unless the alien has filed an application for adjustment of such status pursuant to paragraph (3) and such application has not been denied.

"(c)(1)(A) The Attorney General shall provide that applications for adjustment of status under subsection (a) or under subsection (b)(1) may be filed—

"(i) with the Attorney General, or

"(ii) with an organization or person designated under subparagraph (B), but only if the applicant consents to the forwarding of the application to the Attorney General.

"(B) For purposes of assisting in the program of legalization provided under this section, the Attorney General shall designate qualified voluntary organizations and other qualified State, local, and community organizations and may designate such other persons as the Attorney General determines are qualified and have substantial experience, demonstrated competence, and traditional long-term involvement in the preparation and submittal of applications for adjustment of status under Public law 89-732 or under Public Law 94-145.

"(C) Each organization or person designated under subparagraph (B) must agree to forward to the Attorney General applications filed with it in accordance with subparagraph (A)(ii) but not to forward to the Attorney General applications filed with it unless the applicant has consented to such forwarding. No such organization or person may make a determination required by this section to be made by the Attorney General.

"(D) Whoever files an application for adjustment of status under this section and knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals, or covers up a material fact or makes any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more then $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(E) The Attorney General shall provide for a schedule of fees to be charged for the filing of applications for adjustment under subsection (a) or under subsection (b)(1). The Attorney General shall deposit payments received under the preceding sentence in a separate account and amounts in such account shall be available, without fiscal year limitation, only to cover administrative expenses incurred in connection with the review of applications filed under this section.

"(2) The numerical limitations of section 201 and 202 shall not apply to the adjustment of aliens to lawful permanent resident status under this section.

"(3) The provisions of paragraphs (14), (20), (21), (25), and (32) of section 212(a) shall not be applicable in the determination of an alien's admissibility under subsections (a)(4)(A), (b)(1)(D)(i), (b)(3)(C)(i), and (b)(4)(B)(i), and the Attorney General, in making such determination with respect to a particular alien, may waive any other provision of such section other than paragraph (9), (10), (15) (except as it applies to the adjustment to lawful temporary resident status under subsection (a)), (23) (except for so much of such paragraph as relates to a single offense of simple possession of thirty grams or less of marihuana), (27), (28), (29), or (33), for humanitarian purposes, to assure family unity, or when it is otherwise in the public interest. For purposes of this section, an alien is not ineligible for adjustment of status under this section due to being inadmissible under section 212(a)(15) if the alien demonstrates a history of employment in the United States evidencing self-support without receipt of public cash assistance.

"(4) During the six-month period beginning on the date of the enactment of this section, the Attorney General, in cooperation with qualified organizations and governments designated under paragraph (1) and the Secretary of Labor, shall broadly disseminate information respecting the benefits which aliens may receive under this section and the requirements to obtain such benefits.

"(5)(A) The Attorney General shall provide that in the case of an alien who is apprehended before the beginning of the application period described in subsection (a)(1) and who can establish a prima facie case of eligibility to have his status adjusted under subsection (a) or subsection (b)(1) (but for the fact that he may not apply for such adjustment until the beginning of such period), until the alien has had the opportunity during the first 30 days of the application period to complete the filing of an application for adjustment, the alien—

"(i) may not be deported, and

"(ii) shall be granted authorization to engage in employment in the United States and be provided an 'employment authorized' endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(B) The Attorney General shall provide that in the case of an alien who presents an application for adjustment of status under subsection (a) or subsection (b)(1) during such application period which application establishes a prima facie case of eligibility to have his status adjusted under such subsection, and until a final administrative determination on the application has been made in accordance with this section, the alien—

"(i) may not be deported, and

"(ii) shall be granted authorization to engage in employment in the United States and be provided an 'employment authorized' endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(6) Notwithstanding the Federal Property and Administrative Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et. seq.), the Attorney General is hereby authorized to expend from the appropriation provided for the administration and enforcement of this Act, such amounts as may be necessary for the leasing or acquisition of property in the fulfillment of this section. This authority shall end two years after the date of the enactment of this Act.

"(d)(1) For purposes of subsection (a), (b)(1), or (b)(3), an alien shall not be considered to have resided continuously in the United States, if, during any period for which continuous residence is required, the alien was outside the United States as a result of a departure under an order of deportation.

"(2) Any period of time during which an alien is outside the United States pursuant to the advance parole procedures of the Service shall not be considered as part of the period of time during which an alien is outside in the United States for purposes of this section.

"(e)(1) During the five-year period beginning on the date an alien is granted lawful temporary resident status granted under subsection (b)(1) and during the three-year period beginning on the date an alien is granted lawful permanent resident status under subsection (a), and notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(A) except as provided in paragraph (2), the alien is not eligible for—

"(i) any program of financial assistance furnished under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government,

"(ii) medical assistance under a State plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act, and

"(iii) assistance under the Food Stamp Act of 1977, and

"(B) a State or political subdivision therein may, to the extent consistent with subparagraph (A), provide that the alien is not eligible for the programs of financial or medical assistance furnished under the law of that State or political subdivision.

Programs authorized under the National School Lunch Act, the Child Nutrition Act of 1966, the Vocational Education Act of 1963, Chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981, the Headstate-Follow Through Act, the Job Training Partnership Act, and subparts 4 and 5 of part A of title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 shall not be construed to be programs of financial assistance referred to in subparagraph (A)(i). Programs authorized under the Public Health Service Act and title V of the Social Security Act shall not be construed to be programs of financial assistance referred to in subparagraph (A)(i).

"(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply—

"(A) to a Cuban and Haitian entrant (as defined in paragraph (1) or (2)(A) of section 501(e) of Public Law 96-422, as in effect on April 1, 1983);

"(B) in the case of assistance furnished to an alien who is an aged, blind, or disabled individual (as defined in section 1614(a)(1) of the Social Security Act), or

"(C) in the case of medical assistance (i) for care and services provided to an alien who is under 18 years of age, (ii) for emergency services (as defined for purposes of section 1916(e)(2)(D) of the Social Security Act) or (iii) for services described in section 1916(a)(2)(B) of such Act (relating to services for pregnant women).

The eligibility, comparability, and any other State plan requirements of title XIX of the Social Security Act are superceded to the extent required to restrict the medical assistance in the manner described in subparagraph (C) and paragraph (1)(A)(ii). The Secretary of Health and Human Services, in coordination with the Attorney General, shall promulgate regulations in order to carry out subparagraphs (B) and (C).

"(3) For the purpose of section 501 of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-122), assistance shall be continued under such section with respect to an alien without regard to the alien's adjustment of status under this section.

"(f)(1) The Attorney General, after consultation with the Committees on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and of the Senate and with organizations and persons designated under subsection (c)(1)(B), shall prescribe—

"(A) regulations establishing a definition of the term 'resided continuously', as used in this section, and the evidence needed to establish that an alien has resided continuously in the United States for purposes of this section, and

"(B) such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this section.

"(2) In prescribing regulations described in paragraph (1)(A), the Attorney General shall—

"(A) specify individual periods, and aggregate periods, of absence from the United States which will be considered to break a period of continuous residence in the United States and shall take into account absences due merely to brief and casual trips abroad;

"(B) provide for a waiver, in the discretion of the Attorney General, of the periods specified under subparagraph (A) in the case of an absence from the United States due merely to a brief temporary trip abroad required by emergency or extenuating circumstances outside the control of the alien;

"(C) require that continuous residence in the United States must be established through documents, together with independent corroboration of the information contained in such documents; and

"(D) require that the documents provided under subparagraph (C) be employment-related if employment-related documents with respect to the alien are available to the applicant.

"(3) Regulations prescribed under this section may be prescribed to take effect on an interim final basis if the Attorney General determines that this is necessary in order to implement this section in a timely manner.

"(g)(1) There shall be no administrative or judicial review of a determination respecting an application for adjustment of status under this section except in accordance with this subsection.

"(2) The Attorney General shall establish an appellate authority to provide for a single level of administrative appellate review of such a determination. Such administrative appellate review shall be based upon the administrative record established at the time of the determination on the application and upon such additional or newly discovered evidence as may not have been available at the time of the determination.

"(3)(A) There shall be no judicial review of such a determination, unless the applicant has exhausted the administrative review described in paragraph (2).

"(B) There shall be judicial review of such a denial only in the judicial review of an order of deportation under section 106. Such review shall be based solely upon the administrative record established at the time of the review by the appellate authority and the findings of fact and determinations contained in such record shall be conclusive.

"(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the retired or retainer pay of a member or former member of the Armed Forces of the United States or the annuity of a retired employee of the Federal Government shall not be reduced while such individual is temporarily employed by the Service for a period of not to exceed fifteen months to perform duties in connection with the adjustment of status of aliens under this section.".

(b) The table of contents for chapter 5 of title II is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 245 the following new item:

"Sec. 245A. Adjustment of status of certain entrants before January 1, 1981, to that of persons admitted for temporary or permanent residence.".

(c) For reports on the legalization program provided under the amendment made by subsection (a), see section 405 of this Act.

CUBAN-HAITIAN ADJUSTMENT

SEC. 202. (a) The status of any alien described in subsection (b) may be adjusted by the Attorney General, in the Attorney General's discretion and under such regulations as the Attorney General may prescribe, to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if—

(1) the alien applies for such adjustment within two years after the date of the enactment of this Act;

(2) the alien is otherwise eligible to receive an immigrant visa and is otherwise admissible to the United States for permanent residence, except in determining such admissibility the grounds for exclusion specified in paragraphs (14), (15), (20), (21), (25), and (32) of section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall not apply;

(3) the alien is not an alien described in section 243(h)(2) of such Act;

(4) the alien is physically present in the United States on the date the application for such adjustment is filed; and

(5) the alien has continuously resided in the United States since January 1, 1982.

(b) The benefits provided by subsection (a) shall apply to any alien—

(1) who has received an immigrant designation as a Cuban/Haitian Entrant (Status Pending) as of the date of the enactment of this Act, or

(2) who is a national of Cuba or Haiti, who arrived in the United States before January 1, 1982, with respect to whom any record was established by the Immigration and Naturalization Service before January 1, 1982, and who (unless the alien filed an application for asylum with the Immigration and Naturalization Service before January 1, 1982) was not admitted to the United States as a nonimmigrant.

(c) An alien who, as of the date of the enactment of this Act, is a Cuban and Haitian entrant for the purpose of section 501 of Public Law 96-422 shall continue to be considered such an entrant for such purpose without regard to any adjustment of status effected under this section.

(d) Upon approval of an alien's application for adjustment of status under subsection (a), the Attorney General shall establish a record of the alien's admission for permanent residence as of January 1, 1982.

(e) When an alien is granted the status of having been lawfully admitted for permanent residence pursuant to this section, the Secretary of State shall not be required to reduce the number of immigrant visas authorized to be issued under this Act and the Attorney General shall not be required to charge the alien any fee.

(f) Except as otherwise specifically provided in this section, the definitions contained in the Immigration and Nationality Act shall apply in the administration of this section. Nothing contained in this section shall be held to repeal, amend, alter, modify, effect, or restrict the powers, duties, functions, or authority of the Attorney General in the administration and enforcement of such Act or any other law relating to immigration, nationality, or naturalization. The fact that an alien may be eligible to be granted the status of having been lawfully admitted for permanent residence under this section shall not preclude the alien from seeking such status under any other provision of law for which the alien may be eligible.

STATE LEGALIZATION IMPACT-ASSISTANCE GRANTS

SEC. 203. (a)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated for grants (and related Federal administrative costs) to carry out this section $1,000,000,000 (less the amount described in paragraph (2)) for fiscal year 1986 and for each of the three succeeding fiscal years.

(2)(A) Subject to subparagraphs (B) and (C), the amount described in this paragraph for a fiscal year is equal to the amount estimated to be expended by the Federal Government in the fiscal year for the programs of financial assistance, medical assistance, and assistance under the Food Stamp Act of 1977 for aliens who would not be eligible for such assistance under paragraph (1)(A) of section 249A(e) of the Immigration and Nationality Act but for the provisions of subparagraphs (B) and (C) of paragraph (2) of such section.

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), with respect to—

(i) fiscal year 1986, the amount estimated to be expended is equal to $30,000,000, and

(ii) fiscal year 1987, the amount estimated to be expended is equal to $300,000,000.

For subsequent fiscal years, the amount estimated to be expended shall be such estimate as contained in the annual fiscal budget submitted for that year to the Congress by the President.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I indicated at the outset of this debate, I believe a fundamental deficiency in the pending bill is its weakened provisions on the legalization program.

The bill before us is a retreat from the Humane and Flexible Legalization Program voted twice by the Senate—once by the House of Representatives—and recommended unanimously by the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy.

It is a retreat from the position that the sponsor of this legislation took himself only a few months ago during last year's conference committee on the previous immigration bill adopted by the Senate in the last session.

And it is a retreat from the fundamental principle upon which this legislation has always been based—the "three-legged stool," some have called it—requiring that we move simultaneously on: First, new enforcement provisions; second, implementation of employer sanctions; and third, the institution of a legalization program. These three actions were intended to go hand-in-hand—to be enacted simultaneously, and implemented together.

Mr. President, legalization is an essential corrollary to the implementation of employer sanctions. As we institute new enforcement policies, legalization allows us to wipe the slate clean, to deal humanely and responsibly with the problems of the past as we begin to deal more effectively with future illegal migration.

Rather than granting outright amnesty as in previous bills, the pending bill creates a nine member "Legalization Commission" to determine whether employer sanctions and the new enforcement provisions are in place and working to curtail illegal alien flow before a legalization program can be implemented. They must report within 1 year.

Even with the clarifying amendments adopted in committee, there are still many procedural questions about just how this Commission would work, and just what it would have to determine, before legalization is authorized—and on what grounds it is supposed to make its decision that employer sanctions are curtailing illegal migration.

It is an awkward procedure at best, with many uncertainties, and clearly walks away from a generous legalization program proposed in the previous bills Congess has passed.

What would happen to an undocumented alien who would otherwise be eligible for legalization, but is caught during the year or more the Commission was deliberating? Should he be deported if he has been for many years and has strong ties to the community, and would have been eligible for legalization? And the Commission's findings are inevitably subjective and judgmental, and subject to lawsuits.

Mr. President, the only sensible way to deal with this issue is to follow the Select Commission's recommendation that we move simultaneously on new enforcement strategies at the same time we also clean up the mess current law has created in a a large population of undocumented aliens. After all, it is the result of current law—the "Texas Proviso"—which has helped create the illegal alien problem—a law that says it is legal for an employer to hire an illegal alien, that has thrown a welcome mat for undocumented aliens to come to this country.

The amendment I am offering simply takes the compromise agreed upon in last year's conference committee, to establish a legalization program with a January 1, 1981, cutoff date, a two-track system, to be implemented at the same time, in a phased fashion, as employer sanctions are implemented.

It was a compromise that didn't go as far as I would have preferred, but it was a compromise reached just a few months ago; if it was good enough as a compromise last October, with Senator SIMPSON's support, it ought to be good enough for us now.

I hope the Senate will accept this amendment, which really reflects what we have supported in the past.

Mr. President, just to briefly sum up—the Members of this body have addressed this particular issue I know on two previous times, so they are familiar with the elements that are involved—and I am prepared to go swiftly to a vote.

Under the enforcement provision, as outlined by the chairman of the subcommittee, we have the date of the enactment of the bill and then 6 months later we have notification to various employers after 6 months, which would be a year before the enforcement mechanism is actually implemented. So we have a 12-month period.

That is the same that has been in previous bills. This was recommended by the Select Commission and that has been in previous bills and that is in the current bill.

On the other side is legalization. Previously, in the other two bills, we have had the date of enactment and 6 months thereafter we have the preparation by the INS. Six months for the implementation of the enforcement provisions, and 6 months for INS on legalization.

Then, after INS does the preparation for the Legalization Program, we have a 12-month period where those individuals who have come here prior to 1981 have the opportunity to adjust their status. You have to have been here prior to 1981 to be able to adjust your status. If this bill is accepted and passed, it will be 1985. We have 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985, so they would have to have been here at least for those 4 years. And to be able to adjust their status and to go into a permanent resident alien position, they would have to have been here 3 years prior to that.

So we have the 4 years after 1981 and the 3 years prior to 1981 in order to be able to adjust their status to a permanent resident alien. If they have just been here, say, a year before 1981, they are temporary residents and there is a significant reduction in terms of any benefits they will be eligible for. They will be eligible for benefits if they have been here for 3 years before 1981, which would be a total of 8 years in the United States.

We recognize, and I believe it is an important recognition, that they will have to have been here in good standing, a member of the community. We have seen, in the past, where they have obviously paid the local taxes and paid into Social Security, and we have put those figures into the RECORD in previous debates about the amount they have paid in taxes.

But they will have to have been here for 8 years; otherwise, they would see a significant reduction in terms of benefits.

I do not intend to take the time of the Senate this afternoon to talk about what is happening to those in our society, the undocumented aliens, and the whole subterranean economy and the exploitations which have taken place and all the insidiousness that has been heaped upon these individuals who know if they run into some difficulty and are turned in by their employer they are deported, and what is happening to their children and their attitudes toward the whole process of the system in this country.

There is no question there is a subterranean economy with extraordinary exploitation and all the implications that has for our own society.

We are attempting, with this proposal, to make those individuals who have demonstrated from their past conduct a commitment to this country, a commitment to society, a commitment to their family and their community, and to insure that there will not be a constant sense of fear and to be able to, at that time, adjust their status and move toward citizenship. Then they are at least on the track to be able to make application for citizenship.

So, Mr. President, I hope that we can accept this amendment even though it was altered and changed as we moved through the conference committee process last year. The Commission established in the bill is going to have to make a judgment that the flow of immigrants into the United States has been curtailed. All of us are hopeful, if this is actually enacted into law, that there will be a curtailing of that. But, I, quite frankly, believe, and I think it has been demonstrated by an examination of the flow charts, that if the peso gets devalued 30 or 40 percent, you find a flood of undocumented aliens coming here from neighboring countries, or if there is continued conflict in Central America, that has as much of an effect in terms of flow lines and what is happening in the border areas.

I was talking to a distinguished Congressman who represents the Laredo, TX, area yesterday. He pointed out that last year there was a 125-percent increase in undocumenteds that have actually come across their border. They estimate that 1 out of 3 gets in here. But there has been a dramatic increase and there has almost been a 100-percent increase in the flow, as there has been a 100-percent increase in the Border Patrol.

Mr. President, I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, again a thoughtful review of a tough part of the bill, legalization; something I am very committed to, very much so, and I have been. It is a key to the operation.

I ought to perhaps refer to it as the four-legged stool. I remember the phrase about the three-legged stool, which is now with the fourth leg, which is employer sanctions, together with the other 3: some kind of verification process, increased and appropriate enforcement at our borders internally, and legalization.

So my problem with this amendment—and I speak against the amendment—is this: If legalization is going to occur before we have effective law enforcement in place and before that is achieved, then it is my feeling—and studies disclose—that the illegal population will immediately begin to grow again.

This will create only additional pressures for additional legalization. That is the problem.

These periodic legalizations then, in effect, would be almost a continuing repeal of the U.S. immigration laws. That is exactly what I see could occur.

Legalization in the absence of more effective enforcement is very likely to increase the illegal flow.

It was interesting as the Select Commission discussed setting a legalization date. We kept that confidential for a time when we picked January 1, 1980, as we did in the Select Commission, because we knew when people heard about a date, there would be a crush, a flow across the border saying, "Wait a minute, when did they set that date? When was that?"

If there are any kind of communications procedures that outdo Ma Bell or drums or smoke signals or anything else, it is what is going on in the United States with immigration. People here are seeking to get their relatives here, especially those who have been standing in line. That is how it works. That is why there are so many illegals in the issue when there are so many legals standing in line. That is why legalization must be done.

Legalization and the absence of effective enforcement is going to increase this flow.

Let me quote one sentence from the select commission report:

> Without more effective enforcement than the United States has had in the past, the legalization could serve as a stimulus to further illegal entry, and the select commission is opposed to any program that could precipitate such movement.

Public opinion rebels against amnesty. That is unfortunate. It became the center of a political campaign in Texas last year. That was unfortunate; 35-percent support versus 55-percent against, according to a November 1984 Gallup poll. That is sad.

An amendment to delete legalization entirely failed by only 38 votes in the U.S. House last year.

If we are going to enact legislation, we must be able to assure our constituents that we have effectively addressed the problem of illegal immigration, and that is the need that led to legalization in the first place. The Commission did set January 1, 1980, because they wanted a date that was before public discussion of the legalization beginning.

Again, the Select Commission stated, "The Commission does not want to reward undocumented, illegal aliens who may have come to the United States in part at least because of recent discussions about legalization."

The full Senate in the 98th Congress and the Senate Judiciary Committee this year rejected an attempt to advance this date beyond January 1, 1980. Moving up that date by 1 year would add hundreds of thousands more to the program. They would be those who had formed the least ties to the United States, who have acquired the fewest equities, and who have entered ahead of those abroad who have waited so long to legally enter.

Increasing the date upward would increase the financial stakes on States and localities. They certainly have an interest in this business.

Under the CBO estimate, the increased cost would be $100 million to $200 million per year.

With that, Mr. President, I would say that there is one dangling thread here. Some critics claim that the triggering of legalization will expose ineligible, illegal aliens to additional exploitation before legalization is triggered. I do respectfully reject those arguments on very brief grounds.

The real exploitation in America will occur if we do nothing. That is what will occur in America. The real exploitation will occur if we do not achieve effective enforcement. If legalization draws in new surges of illegal aliens, then we have a whole new generation of exploited aliens who come here to stay.

The bill does not penalize current employers of illegal aliens, but, rather, those who hire illegals after the bill is enacted. Mr. President, I hope you hear that carefully.

The bill does not penalize current employers of illegal aliens but, rather, those who hire illegals after the bill is enacted, new hires.

The Legalization Commission under S. 1200 is not required in any way to certify that employer sanctions and increased enforcement are somehow actually reducing illegal immigration; only that the enforcement mechanisms are in place, receiving adequate funding from this Congress, and it appearing that legalization will not be a stimulus for new illegal immigration. Thus, legalization will be triggered before the enforcement measures really start clamping down.

With that, Mr. President, I remain totally committed to a legalization program. That is why there was an agreement in the Judiciary Committee to start the legalization within 3 years if the Commission does not report any sooner, or terminate the Legalization Commission, which includes persons appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, all of whom must be totally committed to the concept of legalization. I hope it will be much sooner than that. The reason for it is that we must have the enforcement properly in place or we will create a new surge. That is my concern and that is why I speak against the amendment.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the Hatch amendment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SIMPSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I would like to withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order while there is another amendment pending, and there is an amendment pending.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have outlined the differences between what is in the pending legislation and the amendment which I offered.

We have accepted, in the last's year bill, the concept of simultaneous enforcement and legalization.

If this legislation is enacted, all we are asking is that we keep both of those parts of the framework in tandem. If the amendment that I offer is accepted, both of those parts will be kept in tandem. I think it is important that we do that rather than referring this whole issue to a commission that is going to be guided by the word "curtail"—as well intentioned as those commisisoners may be. So I hope, Mr. President, that we would move toward accepting this amendment. It represents the compromise between the House and the Senate in the conference committee last October. Last year it was accepted by the Senator from Wyoming. So it seems to me that if it was good enough last fall on the basis of the merits, it ought to be good enough for us to be willing to accept it today.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. SIMON. I would just add that when Commissioner Nelson appeared before us, I asked him whether his statement of 2 years ago that they could move immediately on legalization was still valid, he said they could, they are ready to go on it. It just seems to me the Senator's amendment makes eminent good sense. I hope it will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 65, as follows:

NOT VOTING—9

Cochran	East	Kassebaum
Cohen	Ford	Pryor
Dole	Garn	Stafford

So the amendment (No. 605) was rejected.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, for the benefit of my colleagues—many of them asked about the schedule—let me try to assist or share some information as to what we are attempting to do in proceeding with this measure. I think the number of amendments is decreasing. Some have been taken care of, some have been withdrawn. So I think we can handle the business today—at least, that is still the intent of the minority manager and myself.

At this time, we will go to a colloquy, a very brief colloquy of Senator HATFIELD; then to Senator HART; then to Senator MCCLURE; which is the amendment with regard to search warrants; then to Senator CHILES; and then to Senator MOYNIHAN, which would be very swiftly taken; then a Metzenbaum amendment, a Simon amendment, or perhaps two, two other amendments that will be accepted, and we will proceed on that schedule.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, as my friend knows there also will be an amendment that I will offer plus a colloquy which I think we are still trying to work up. That amendment may or may not be acceptable. We do not yet know. I do want to be on that list.

Mr. SIMPSON. May I ask my colleague and friend from Michigan if that is the amendment with regard to the northern border activities, or is there to be a colloquy also?

Mr. LEVIN. The colloquy relates to the northern border. The amendment relates to the question of legalization.

Mr. SIMPSON. Which is the subject of a discussion we are now having about a colloquy perhaps to supplant that.

Mr. LEVIN. No, I do not think that will supplant the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I see.

Mr. LEVIN. The Hart amendment which is going to be offered is not a substitute for the amendment that the Senator from Wyoming and I spoke about this morning.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

With that, I recognize the Senator from Oregon for that colloquy or the beginning of it.

Is he prepared to do that or shall I go to Senator HART first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. HART. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT NO. 606

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] for himself and Mr. LEVIN proposes an amendment numbered 606.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Page 13, line 4, before the period insert "and unfair immigration-related employment practices".

Page 13, line 7, strike out "section" and insert in lieu thereof "sections".

"UNFAIR IMMIGRATION-RELATED EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

"SEC. 274B. (a) PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGIN OR IMMIGRATION STATUS.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—It is unfair immigration-related employment practice for a person or other entity to engage in a pattern or practice of discrimination against individuals (other than unauthorized aliens, described in section 274A(h)(2)) with respect to the hiring, or recruitment or referral for a fee, of individuals for employment—

"(A) because of such individual's national origin, or

"(B) in the case of a citizen or intending citizen (as defined in paragraph (3)), because of their status as United States citizens, as aliens admitted for permanent residence, as aliens admitted as refugees, as aliens granted asylum, or as aliens with lawful temporary resident status granted under section 202 of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to—

"(A) a person or other entity that employs three or fewer employees,

"(B) a person's or entity's discrimination because of an individual's national origin if the discrimination with respect to that person or entity and that individual is covered under section 703 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or

"(C) discrimination under paragraph (1)(B) which is otherwise required in order to comply with law, regulation, or executive order, or required by Federal, State, or local government contract, or which the Attorney General determines to be essential for an employer to do business with an agency or department of the Federal, State, or local government.

"(3) DEFINITION OF CITIZEN OR INTENDING CITIZEN.—As used in paragraph (1), the term 'citizen or intending citizen' means an individual who—

"(A) is a citizen or national of the United States, or

"(B) is an alien who—

"(i) is lawfully admitted for permanent residence, is admitted as a refugee under section 207, is granted asylum under section 208, or is granted lawful temporary resident status under section 202 of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, and

"(ii) evidences an intention to become a citizen of the United States through completing a declaration of intention to become a citizen;

but does not include an alien who fails to apply for naturalization within six months of the date the alien first becomes eligible (by virtue of period of lawful permanent residence) to apply for naturalization or, if later, within six months after the date of the enactment of this section.

"(b) COMPLAINTS OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person alleging that the person is adversely affected directly by an unfair immigration-related employment practice or an officer of the Service alleging that an unfair immigration-related employment practice has occurred or is occurring may file a charge respecting such practice or violation with the Special Counsel (appointed under subsection (c)). Charges shall be in writing under oath or affirmation and shall contain such information as the Attorney General requires. The person filing a charge shall serve a notice of the charge (including the date, place, and circumstances of the alleged unfair immigration-related employment practice) on the person or entity involved within 10 days. The Special Counsel shall notify each complainant of the notice required under the previous sentence.

"(2) NO OVERLAP WITH EEOC COMPLAINTS.—No charge may be filed respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice described in subsection (a)(1)(A) if a charge with respect to that practice based on the same set of facts has been filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and no charge respecting an employment practice may be filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under such title if a charge with respect to such practice based on the same set of facts has been filed under this subsection. The previous sentence shall not apply where a charge has been mistakenly filed and has been withdrawn.

"(c) SPECIAL COUNSEL.—

"(1) APPOINTMENT.—The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Special Counsel for Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Special Counsel') within the Department of Justice, but outside the Immigration and Naturalization Service, to serve for a term of four years. In the case of a vacancy in the office of the Special Counsel the President may designate the officer or employee who shall act as Special Counsel during such vacancy.

"(2) DUTIES.—The Special Counsel shall be responsible for investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under this section and in respect of the prosecution of all such complaints before immigration judges and the exercise of certain functions under subsection (i)(1).

"(3) COMPENSATION.—The Special Counsel is entitled to receive compensation at the rate now or hereafter provided for grade GS-17 of the General Schedule, under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

"(4) REGIONAL OFFICES.—The Special Counsel, in accordance with regulations of the Attorney General, shall establish such regional offices as may be necessary to carry out his duties.

"(5) STAFFING OF OFFICE OF SPECIAL COUNSEL.—In providing staffing for the Special Counsel, the Attorney General shall take into consideration the volume of charges filed with the Special Counsel under this section, as well as the complexity of those charges and the need for the conduct of investigations under the second sentence of subsection (d)(1).

"(d) INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINTS.—

"(1) BY SPECIAL COUNSEL.—The Special Counsel shall investigate each charge received and, within 90 days of the date of the receipt of the charge, determine whether or not there is reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true and whether or not to bring a complaint with respect to the charge before an administrative law judge. The Special Counsel may, on his own initiative, conduct investigations respecting unfair immigration-related employment practices and, based on such an investigation and subject to paragraph (3), file a complaint before such a judge.

"(2) PRIVATE ACTIONS WHERE A PATTERN OR PRACTICE VIOLATION.—If the Special Counsel, after receiving such a charge respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice which alleges a pattern or practice of discriminatory activity, has not filed a complaint before an immigration judge with respect to such charge within such 90-day period, the person making the charge may (subject to paragraph (3)) file a complaint directly before such a judge.

"(3) TIME LIMITATIONS ON COMPLAINTS.—No complaint may be filed respecting any unfair immigration-related employment practice occurring more than 180 days prior to the date of the filing of the charge with the Special Counsel and the service of a copy thereof upon the person or entity against whom such charge is made. This subparagraph shall not prevent the subsequent amending of a charge or complaint under subsection (e)(1).

"(e) HEARINGS.—

"(1) NOTICE.—Whenever a complaint is made that a person or entity has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, an immigration judge shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person or entity a copy of the complaint and a notice of hearing before the judge at a place therein fixed, not less than five days after the serving of the complaint. Any such complaint may be amended by the judge conducting the hearing in the judge's discretion at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon. The person or entity so complained of shall have the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint and to appear in person or otherwise and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint.

"(2) CONDUCT OF HEARINGS.—Hearings on complaints under this subsection shall be considered before immigration judges who are specially designated by the Attorney General as having special training respecting employment discrimination and, to the extent practicable, before such judges who only consider cases under this section.

"(3) COMPLAINANT AS PARTY.—Any person filing a charge with the Special Counsel respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice shall be considered a full party to any complaint before an immigration judge respecting such practice and any subsequent appeal respecting that complaint. In the discretion of the judge conducting the hearing, any other person may be allowed to intervene in the said proceeding and to present testimony.

"(f) TESTIMONY AND AUTHORITY OF HEARING OFFICERS.—

"(1) TESTIMONY.—The testimony taken by the immigration judge shall be reduced to writing. Thereafter, the judge, in his discretion, upon notice may provide for the taking of further testimony or hear argument.

"(2) AUTHORITY OF IMMIGRATION JUDGES.—In conducting investigations and hearings under this subsection and in accordance with regulations of the Attorney General, the Special Counsel and immigration judges shall have reasonable access to examine evidence of any person or entity being investigated. The immigration judges by subpena may compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence at any designated place or hearing. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena lawfully issued under this paragraph and upon application of the immigration judge, an appropriate district court of the United States may issue an order requiring compliance with such subpena and any failure to obey such order may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

"(g) DETERMINATIONS.—

"(1) ORDER.—The immigration judge shall issue and cause to be served on the parties to the proceeding an order.

"(2) ORDERS FINDING VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If, upon the preponderance of the testimony taken, an immigration judge determines that that any person or entity named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, then the judge shall state his findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person or entity an order which requires such person or entity to cease and desist from such unfair immigration-related employment practices.

"(B) CONTENTS OF ORDER.—Such an order also may require the person or entity—

"(i) to comply with the requirements of section 274A(b) with respect to individuals hired (or recruited or referred for employment for a fee) during a period of up to three years;

"(ii) to retain for the period referred to in clause (i) and only for purposes consistent with section 274A(b)(6), the name and address of each individual who applies, in person or in writing, for hiring for an existing position, or for recruiting or referring for a fee, for employment in the United States;

"(iii) to hire individuals directly and adversely affected, with or without back pay; and

"(iv)(I) except as provided in subclause (II), to pay a civil penalty of not more than $1,000 for each individual discriminated against, and

"(II) in the case of a person or entity previously subject to such an order, to pay a civil penalty of not more than $2,000 for each individual discriminated against.

"(C) LIMITATION ON BACK PAY REMEDY.—In providing a remedy under subparagraph (B)(iii), back pay liability shall not accrue from a date more than two years prior to the filing of a charge with an immigration judge. Interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the individual or individuals aggrieved against shall operate to reduce the back pay otherwise allowable under such paragraph. No order shall require the hiring of an individual as an employee or the payment to him of any back pay, if the individual was refused employment for any reason other than discrimination on account of national origin or citizenship status.

"(D) TREATMENT OF DISTINCT ENTITIES.—In applying this subsection in the case of a person or entity composed of distinct, physically separate subdivisions each of which provides separately for the hiring, recruiting, or referring for employment without reference to the practices of, or under the control of, or common control with, another subdivision, each such subdivision shall be considered a separate person or entity.

"(3) ORDERS NOT FINDING VIOLATIONS.—If upon the preponderance of the testimony taken an immigration judge determines that the person or entity named in the complaint has engaged or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, then the judge shall state his findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the complaint.

"(h) AWARDING OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.—In amy complaint respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice, an immigration judge, in the judge's discretion, may allow a prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee.

"(i) JUDICIAL REVIEW PROCEDURES.—

"(1) MODIFICATION OF FINDINGS OR ORDERS PRIOR TO FILING RECORD IN COURT.—Until the record in a case is filed in a court under this subsection, an immigration judge may at any time upon reasonable notice and in such manner as the judge deems proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by the judge.

"(2) PETITION OF COURT FOR ENFORCEMENT OF ORDER, PROCEEDINGS, REVIEW OF JUDGMENT.—The special Counsel may petition any court of appeals of the United States, or if all the courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States, within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for the enforcement of the order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall file in the court the record in the proceedings, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceedings and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the immigration judge. No objection that has not been urged before the judge shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the judge with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the judge, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the judge and to be made a part of the record. The immigration judge may modify his findings as to the facts, or make new findings by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and the judge shall file such modified or new findings, which findings with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive, and shall file his recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. Upon the filing of the record with it the jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate United States court of appeals if applications was made to the district court, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

"(3) REVIEW OF FINAL ORDER ON PETITION TO COURT.—Any person aggrieved by a final order of an immigration judge under this section granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any United States court of appeals in the circuit wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such a court a written petition praying that the order of the immigration judge be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the immigration judge, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court the record in the proceeding, certified by the judge, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Special Counsel under paragraph (2), and shall have the same jurisdiction to grant to the aggrieved party such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the judge, the findings of the judge with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall in like manner be conclusive.

"(4) INSTITUTION OF COURT PROCEEDINGS AS STAY OF JUDGE'S ORDER.—The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the immigration judge's order.

"(5) INJUNCTIONS.—The Special Counsel may, upon issuance of a complaint under this section charging that a person has engaged or is engaging in an unfair immigration-related employment practice, to petition any United States district court, within any district wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon such have jurisdiction to grant to the Special Counsel such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

"(6) AWARDING OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.—In any proceeding under this subsection, the court, in its discretion, may allow a prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of costs.".

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Oregon for the purposes of offering an amendment or making a statement without losing my right to the floor in the sequence of consideration of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, first, I thank the Senator from Colorado, Senator HART, for his kindness in yielding to me for the purpose of making a brief statement and in accommodating my particular schedule.

Mr. President, I express very great appreciation to the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator SIMPSON, and also the managers of the bill and other members of that committee, for incorporating a number of changes in the employment verification system in order to assure the citizens of this country that S. 1200 was not going to allow a "back-door" implementation of a national identification system.

Two years ago, I offered an amendment which granted Congress a "legislative veto" power over any Presidential proposal to implement a national ID card.

Section 121 of S. 1200 provides Congress with 2 years notice before any "major change" can be implemented. And it gives Congress a second look by requiring a specific appropriation for any major change in the system of identification established by this bill.

Mr. President, I would like Congress to consider that this is not just some minor point or some peculiar preoccupation on my part about a national ID card, because I think we are heading toward that with the Social Security card as a national identifier, because of the rapid technology that we are experiencing and because we are blindly, I believe, stumbling into a centralized governmental data bank.

Rapid technological change is allowing the power of government to grow silently and subtly, but I think the public is far more aware of this than many in Government realize because a 1984 Gallup poll showed that half of Americans believed that they have little or no privacy because our Government can learn anything it wants to about them.

Eighty-six percent said they feared Government will use confidential information for unauthorized purposes.

I believe those fears of the American public are entirely justified, for let us be mindful of the fact that the Federal Government today stores 4 billion files relating to individuals. HHS and Education have over 1 billion such files. Treasury has almost 1 billion. Justice has 200 million, and the Selective Service has 11 million.

The average American today has 18 to 20 files held on him or her by the Government. His or her name will appear in an estimated 39 governmental databanks.

The Social Security number has become precisely what the system's founders swore it would never be, a national identification card.

Seventy percent of the States use the Social Security number for driver's licensing purposes. Many States use the Social Security number as the identifier for criminal records shared with the FBI, or for even high school recordkeeping purposes.

Depending on where you live, Social Security numbers have been required to give blood, cash a check, obtain a library card, install a telephone, or attend a party at the White House.

In this Congress, I will introduce legislation requiring private industry to inform the individual whether Social Security number disclosure is mandatory or voluntary under the law. Today, not even this minimal protection exists.

There was much ado last year about Orwell's vision in "1984". I think George Orwell missed the mark—Big Brother Government has a twin: Big Business.

Today, people do not realize that there are 150 million credit information files—data on more than half the U.S. population; hundreds of millions of files held by the medical profession, insurance companies, consumer groups, and personnel files of corporations.

More than half of the American labor force is now employed in occupations related in some way to gathering, storing, processing, interpreting, or disseminating information.

We have all heard that the economy is really shifting from an industrial base to an information society.

But let us be mindful that the threat to individuals from technological encroachments by corporate forces is greater because business operates under fewer constitutional restrictions.

What might happen to all of the interconnected databanks of corporations when the Government finds a compelling purpose to access those files?

Let me emphasize that already the Government is arranging to access credit files to find tax evaders. What happens when the Government's request for computer information is wrapped in the flag of national security?

I might also point out that technology is being used here to cover up for the Government's failure to have in place an enforceable tax system.

Mr. President, the relentless march of technology is outpacing our ability to legislate protective safeguards. Again, we must ask ourselves that second question: Are today's technological changes setting the stage for greater governmental power, and, if so, what are we doing about it?

This is really, I think, the fundamental issue and why I think it is so important that the committee under the leadership of Senator SIMPSON, Senator KENNEDY, and others, has really rendered a very important service to our people by incorporating this action in their section of this bill. I commend them for it.

But that does not solve the entire problem, and I will speak more to that at a later date when I introduce specific legislation curtailing the uses of the Social Security number, and improving the privacy protections.

So I shall ask my colleague from Wyoming, the manager of the bill and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, to engage in a colloquy with me on the intentions of Congress with respect to the provisions in S. 1200 pertaining to the employment verification system.

Subsection c of section 121 of the bill involves the regulation of changes in the employment verification system. I am concerned that the language in this subsection could be used to implement a national identification card system, and therefore I have a few questions for my good friend from Wyoming.

First, it is the intention of the committee that the Social Security card, by the enactment of S. 1200, is to be a national ID card? Will the administration be permitted to propose an expanded use of the Social Security card without complying with the 2-year notice requirement of (A)(ii)?

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me make clear to my esteemed colleague from Oregon that this committee does not intend to institute a national ID card through the enactment of this legislation. The language of S. 1200 does permit the formulation of a counterfeit-resistant Social Security card but it does not authorize any expanded use of the Social Security card other than as specified in the bill in "Documents Evidencing Employment Authorization" section. Numerous experts and committees have concluded that the Social Security card in its present state is easily counterfeitable and needs to be improved. This bill allows that. But this bill does not in any way expand the permissible uses of the Social Security card number other than allowing it to be one of the documents which may be used to evidence employment authorization for purposes of determining employment eligibility.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank my friend. My second question involves the institution of demonstration projects permitting the use of a telephone verification system. I have read the language of S. 1200 and I am assured that the President may not institute such a system without complying with the 2-year notice clause.

Mr. SIMPSON. The President could only undertake limited demonstration projects relating to such a system. Furthermore, such a demonstration project could last no longer than 3 years.

Mr. HATFIELD. Would my colleague tell me whether the language permitting the institution of demonstration projects allows the President to broadly grant demonstration projects which would in effect institute a telephone verification system, while side-stepping the 2-year notice requirement?

Mr. SIMPSON. No it does not.

Mr. HATFIELD. And the demonstration projects which might institute a temporary telephone verification system, limited in scope and effect, would still be subject to the privacy of information requirements of the bill?

Mr. SIMPSON. My friend from Oregon is absolutely right. In fact, all of the provisions of S. 1200 fall within the protection of the Privacy Act of 1974, as amended.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have one more question for my friend from Wyoming. He was very gracious in the drafting of S. 1200 to accommodate one of my major concerns; namely, that the President could not implement major changes in the system of identification authorized by this bill without those changes being specifically funded through an appropriations measure. I read (C)(ii) of subsection (c) as stating that no major change may be implemented unless Congress specifically provides appropriations for that change. Am I correct in saying that the executive branch of Government could not institute a major change as defined by S. 1200 without a specific line appropriation?

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me respond to the Senator this way: The committee does not intend to allow the executive branch, through the transfer of funds from one account to the next, or through the use of funds appropriated for general administration purposes, to implement a major change. Each appropriations committee will have an opportunity to specifically consider the level of appropriations for any major change proposed by the President.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has satisfied my concerns and I have no further questions. Senator SIMPSON has been a defender of the individual's liberty and privacy throughout his years as a practicing lawyer and his years in public service, and he has struck a fair balance between those rights and the need for an enforceable worker employment verification system.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado again for his kindness in giving me this window in this afternoon's schedule.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Oregon, and it was indeed my honor to accommodate his very busy schedule.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HART. Is the pending business the amendment laid before the Senate by the Senator from Colorado?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, it is.

Mr. HART. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I share very deeply the concerns expressed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] and I associate myself with his statement.

I would dissent at only one point.

I know the committee has tried hard to eliminate the risk and fear of a legislative and administrative process leading to national identity cards or internal passports.

This bill is free of imminent danger in that regard, but it is a first step in that direction.

I remain deeply concerned that because I continue to believe that the procedures in this bill will not work, cannot work, and will not solve our immigration problems, Congress will come back and take the next step, and the next, until the threat that the Senator from Oregon and I, and others, fear the most—interference with the personal freedom of our citizens to work and travel freely in our society, will materialize.

The use of employer sanctions as a vehicle to enforce immigration laws is the critical first step.

I hope that the step will never be taken.

The "discretionary" employer sanctions in this bill will inevitably invite employment discrimination, but they will not be effective to deter illegal immigration.

Those employers who depend on them will not, under the sanctions in this bill, stop hiring them.

Employers will be burdened, but the sanctions are not strict enough to be effective.

Only by increasing the burdens on employers can the sanctions be made more effective.

I am not suggesting this.

I am merely pointing out one of the internal problems of this bill.

Without an identity card, it will be impossible for employers to comply with the provisions of the bill. There are, and I have elsewhere suggested, alternative means of discouraging illegal immigration.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, during consideration of the immigration legislation during the 98th Congress, together with Senator LEVIN I offered an amendment dealing with "alienage discrimination." The amendment is premised upon widespread concern regarding employer sanctions. These sanctions, I am certain, are not included with the intent of producing discrimination against Hispanics, or, indeed, any other minorities, for that matter, and resident aliens.

But a side effect of the sanctions may well be discrimination against individuals qualified by law to work, but who are unjustly prevented from doing so.

How would such discrimination be manifested?

Employers fearful of sanctions will discriminate against individuals by:

Refusing to hire resident aliens authorized to work;

Preferring citizens in the hiring process;

Forcing noncitizens to verify status with INS before considering applications.

Is it inconceivable that such unintended discrimination will occur? Of course not.

First, there is a climate of fear and ignorance in certain sections of this country about noncitizens. There does seem to be a general association of the problem of illegal immigration with resident aliens despite their having arrived in this country legally.

Second, employers do not understand the complexities of immigration law. They have:

Erroneously believed that prior bills became law, they did not. Yet, discrimination against resident aliens occurred;

They have erroneously believed that Simpson-Mazzoli applied to current hires;

They have refused to recognize valid work authorizations of all kinds, from temporary permits to green cards they thought had to be green;

Third, we have the problem of faulty INS recordkeeping. INS records are woefully incomplete for recent and long-term aliens. Worse, INS takes weeks, and sometimes months, to resolve errors which exist.

Now, the sponsors of the pending legislation may argue that recordkeeping provisions providing good faith safeguards on compliance gives the employer an affirmative defense.

That may be true, but this defense helps the employer, not the job applicant.

Employers will discriminate to avoid sanctions altogether rather than trust the workings of the good faith safeguards in the context of litigation.

To avoid these problems, the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Colorado believe the bill should be amended. Additional language should provide what existing laws and safeguards do not: protection against discrimination on the basis of alienage.

Title VII does not cover alienage discrimination.

Section 1981 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 is not a trustworthy guardian of alien rights.

The law does not prevent State and local governments from discrimination against aliens under the political community exception to traditional strict scrutiny under equal protection.

I ask unanimous consent that a Congressional Research Service memorandum of law detailing these deficiencies be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE,
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, DC, July 15, 1985.

From: American Law Division.

Subject: Comments on Legal Issues Raised by Draft of Staff Report on "Alienage Discrimination in Employment and Age Discrimination Agencies."

Reference is made to the inquiry made relative to the above. Specifically, your staff asked that we review a copy of the aforementioned draft report, prepared by the staff of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, and provide our written comments on the legal issues raised there. Basically, that report surveys current federal law and court decisions with respect to the prohibition of discrimination based upon an individual's alienage or non-citizenship status, the history of past attempts to include protections against such discrimination in the federal civil rights laws, and the opinions of selected experts as to the prevalence of alienage discrimination in our society. Based on its finding and analysis, the staff report makes the following general conclusions:

(1) "There is significant coverage of alienage discrimination under current law; (2) there is very little evidence that alienage discrimination occurs with any frequency, nor is it commonly held that employer sanctions will cause such discrimination to occur; and (3) there is nearly universal opposition among employment discrimination experts to creating a new anti-discrimination agency."

This memorandum will examine the case law and related legal analysis that form the basis for the staff report's conclusion in (1) above. Because almost wholly founded on opinions revealed by staff interviews with scholars and others working in the employment field, the empirical and policy underpinnings for the conclusion in (2) and (3) above are beyond the scope of these comments.

The draft report correctly observes that under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act,[1] "alienage" is "not . . . one of the prohibited forms of employment discrimination." It also notes that in Espinoza v. Farah Manufacturing Co.,[2] the Supreme Court refused to equate "alienage" with "national origin" discrimination, which is covered, except in those circumstances where "discrimination on the basis of citizenship . . . has the purpose or effect of discrimination on the basis of national origin." Consequently, Title VII may be of rather limited utility in combatting alienage discrimination in employment.[3]

The report, however, finds that there is "significant federal statutory and case law" banning alienage discrimination under, among others, the Civil Rights Act of 1866. As currently codified at 42 U.S.C. 1981, that law in relevant part secures to "all persons . . . the same right . . . to make and enforce contracts . . . as white persons." First enacted in 1866 to enforce the anti-slavery ban of the Thirteenth Amendment, only to be re-enacted in 1870 following ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, § 1981 has most often been applied in modern times as a remedy for racial discrimination in contracts of employment, public and private. In McDonald Douglas v. Santa Fe Trail Transportation Co.,[4] the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed that § 1981 was intended "to proscribe discrimination in the making and enforcement of contracts against, or in favor of, any race." Less well settled, however, is the extent to which the Act provides a safeguard against discrimination on nonracial grounds.[5]

The staff report cites the Fifth Circuit decision in Guerra v. Manchester Terminal Corp.[6] for the proposition that "an employment practice which discriminate(s) on the basis of citizenship (is) prohibited by section 1981," and indeed this appears to be the highest court to so hold. While representing a possible majority view, a number of courts have held to the contrary, finding racial animus a necessary predicate to § 1981 action, and the issue would seem unsettled at best. The courts, moreover, have most often sustained challenges to alienage discrimination in state employment.[7] There is less consensus, however, as to the legal status of discrimination against aliens by private parties. In De Malherbe v. International Union of Elevator Constr.[8] the court, noting that the protection of aliens stems from the 1870 re-enactment of that statute under authority of the Fourteenth Amendment, concluded that state action was required. Similarly in Ben Yakir v. Gaylinn Associated, Inc.,[9] the district court dismissed a § 1981 alienage discrimination claim by an Israeli citizen, stating that "this court has decided on several occasions that claims under section 1981 that attack private acts must allege racial discrimination."[10]

Schlei & Grossman,[11] on whom the staff report relies for its conclusions as to the adequacy of the § 1981 remedy, do not appear totally sanguine in their views on the subject. "The major drawbacks for plaintiffs if they are required to enforce their rights under § 1981 are the absence of any administrative remedy, the more stringent proof requirements, and possible statute of limitations problems. Furthermore, § 1981 might provide protection only to persons who can claim that the nature of discrimination was based on racial or color characteristics."[12]

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the legislation must be amended to remedy this deficiency in current law.

The Senator from Colorado, along with the Senator from Michigan, offered an amendment regarding alienage discrimination when the immigration bill was considered by the Senate in 1983. Although our proposal was not adopted, a similar amendment was adopted by the House on a 404-to-9 vote. When the conference report died last year, Senator SIMPSON recommended a hearing on alienage discrimination prior to the passage of a new bill in the 99th Congress.

It is the understanding of the Senator from Colorado that such a hearing was scheduled for the upcoming day or the upcoming week or two. It now

[3] One commentator, in discussing EEOC guidelines incorporating the Espinoza standards, put the matter thusly:

"A little reflection will indicate that this . . . in practice adds almost nothing to the general rule of nondiscrimination on basis of national origin. If the 'purpose' is national origin discrimination, the case is made with or without the alienage component. Similarly if a case can be made, by statistics or otherwise, that the 'effect' of an employer's citizenship requirement is to exclude a disparate proportion of Mexican-Americans, the same statistics would undoubtedly support a charge based on national origin discrimination as such, quite apart from the citizenship element. Accordingly, it is perhaps not surprising that no cases seem to have appeared since Espinoza and the revision of the guidelines in which a citizenship requirement has been relied upon by a plaintiff, on the theory that it was a pretext for national origin discrimination. appears, as the Senator from Colorado understands, that even that hearing may have now been postponed. The problem is this: The hearing to deal with alienage discrimination will occur after the Senate completes action on the bill. This is why the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Colorado are raising this issue at this time.

An administrative framework should be provided for litigating claims of discrimination on the basis of alienage. This framework would expand the authority of existing immigration judges and attorneys in the Justice Department.

The examples of discrimination against Hispanics, refugees, resident aliens, and others are known and well documented. The continuing problems with INS records are understood. The difficulties which employers have with understanding their obligations under existing imigration laws are legion. With the provision on employer sanctions contained in the pending bill, these problems will only grow worse.

The amendment which we are offering today is designed to focus public attention on this issue. It will offer our colleagues an opportunity to consider some of the issues which should be covered during the hearing next week. And, it will enable the Senator from Wyoming to discuss further how this issue might be handled.

First, the amendment bars unfair immigration related employment practices against individuals on the basis of their national origin or status as a U.S. citizen, permanent resident, refugee, asylee, or legalized temporary resident.

Second, the amendment establishes an Office of Special Counsel to investigate charges of discrimination based on the claimant's immigration status.

Third, the amendment empowers immigration judges to issue cease and desist orders if the judge determines that an employer is engaging in an unfair immigration-related practice.

This amendment does not establish a new bureacracy. The Special Counsel will be located in the Department of Justice.

The process is not open-ended. The amendment provides for a 90-day period for the Special Counsel to take action.

There will be no overlap between the Special Counsel and the EEOC. An individual will have the option of filing a claim with the EEOC or the Special Counsel, but not the ability to file before both, concurrently.

Discrimination against individuals on the basis of national origin does exist. The record is replete with examples, under current law, of firms "playing it safe" by checking only Hispanics for proof of work authorization. Playing it safe by refusing to hire Hispanics or other minorities. Playing it safe by checking Latinos for green cards. That, Mr. President, is not right. And the presence of employer sanctions can only make this situation worse.

Mr. President, this issue is important. It is, in fact, fundamental. And it is, in fact, one of constitutional rights and of civil liberties. It is a question of justice for people who are vulnerable to indignities and discrimination which the majority of Americans will never know.

In earlier debate, the Senator from Wyoming evinced some interest in working this problem out. I would appreciate hearing his reaction to the proposal of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Michigan on what we believe and many outside this Chamber believe to be one of the most serious problems that this legislation contains.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, first I wish to commend my friend from Colorado and associate myself with his remarks.

As our friend, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration, knows, I have been concerned about the possibility that employer sanctions will result in discrimination against legal aliens and American citizens. I entered into a brief colloquy with the chairman and the majority leader on Tuesday evening in which they agreed that the issue of discrimination is an important part of the issue of immigration reform and that the issue should be addressed by the Senate before the conference on any immigration bill begins.

Those of us who are concerned about this issue had requested that a hearing be held on employer discrimination. The chairman has agreed to hold a joint hearing with the House on the issue of employment discrimination. The joint hearing will provide a record in debuting this issue and determining the best apparatus for addressing the discrimination problem created by this bill. Senator HART and I and others who requested the hearing had hoped that the hearing would take place before the Senate considered S. 1200. In light of the fact that we are now moving forward on S. 1200, it is important that a legislative record be established in the Senate which reflects the importance of this issue and our intention to further pursue a legislative remedy after the joint hearing.

Mr. President, two types of discrimination may result from employer sanctions. First, employers seeking to avoid the consequences of hiring illegal aliens may simply refuse to hire foreign looking or foreign speaking persons. This type of discrimination—discrimination based really on national origin—is already covered by title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which prohibits discrimination on the basis of national origin. There are, however, a number of major gaps in title VII coverage. As a result of these gaps in coverage, the potential for discrimination against foreign-looking persons which arises under this bill will not often be remediable. This is because title VII does not cover discrimination by employers who hire less than 15 workers and title VII does not cover discrimination for those hired for less than 20 weeks, which excludes most agricultural workers. Thus, title VII does not adequately protect those persons who may be discriminated against as a result of the employer sanctions established in S. 1200.

Second, prospective employees may be discriminated against on the basis of their alienage as a result of the employer sanctions provisions in S. 1200. Because the bill makes it unlawful to knowingly hire illegal aliens, employers may simply refuse to hire persons who are not U.S. citizens, although they are legally in the United States. While the bill establishes an affirmative defense to the charge of unlawfully hiring an illegal alien if the employer verifies that the employee is not an illegal alien, many employers may find it safer and easier to adopt a policy of refusing to hire persons who are nor U.S. citizens, although those persons are legally in the United States.

Mr. President, title VII does not prohibit discrimination based on alienage. In 1983, at Senator HART's request, the American Law Division of the Library of Congress prepared an analysis of the existing protections against discrimination based on alienage. In the analysis, Charles V. Dale stated:

> Another potential limitation on the effectiveness of a title VII remedy in the present context may be the Supreme Court ruling in Espinoza v. Farah Manufacturing Co., Inc. Although title VII renders national original an unlawful basis of discrimination, the Farah Court declined to find congressional intent to make discrimination against aliens in private employment unlawful. In a suit against an employer for failure to hire a Mexican citizen solely because of her alien status, the court unqualifiedly held that employment discrimination based on non-citizenship is not covered by title VII.

Mr. President, there is a need to provide some mechanism which will allow persons who are discriminated against by employers as a result of employer sanctions to obtain redress. The Senator from Wyoming has said that the issue of discrimination based on alienage is a "vexing, puzzling" one. I agree. The complexity of this issue should not prevent us from finding a legislative solution to any new discrimination which might develop as a result of employer sanctions before final approval of this legislation by the Congress.

The joint hearing to be held on the issue of employment discrimination will provide us with the detailed information we need.

Under an agreement reached Tuesday night between the majority leader and the floor manager, we will be able, as a practical matter, to pursue this matter legislatively after the hearing and before any conference occurs with the House on immigration legislation. That is as it should be, because we cannot, in good conscience, finally approve legislation which imposes sanctions on employers for hiring illegal aliens without also providing remedies for those people we want to protect, who are discriminated against as a result.

Again, I congratulate my friend from Colorado for his leadership in this issue, his determination that we find a way of resolving it in a way that will help us do so successfully and effectively and not be counterproductive to our cause. That is what he is about here this afternoon, and I congratulate him on that strategy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund to Senator SIMPSON regarding employment related discrimination be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MALDEF,
Washington, DC, July 16, 1985.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Please accept for your consideration this report and analysis on alienage discrimination in employment. This report carefully examines the extent (or lack) of protections to remedy discrimination against persons legally admitted to the U.S. who are eligible to work, but who are not American citizens. It also sets out numerous examples of existing discrimination against legal resident aliens and why we believe employer sanctions will exacerbate this problem.

Not surprisingly, our conclusions differ from those reached by your staff in their report to the Judiciary Committee. The staff report, rather than resolving questions that could be addressed in a hearing, points out the need for a hearing. Let me summarize a few of our findings.

1. Title VII does not protect individuals against discrimination on the basis of alienage, unless it is a pretext for discrimination on the basis of national origin. Espinoza v. Farah Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 86 (1973). On this point we agree with the Staff Report on Title VII's coverage, although we note that national origin discrimination protections will not adequately protect legal resident aliens from discriminatory practices.

2. There is a serious dispute among the federal circuits and legal scholars whether Section 1981 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 protects persons from discrimination on the basis of alienage.

This findings contradict the findings of the Staff Report. The Staff Report concludes that Section 1981 provides a remedy against alienage discrimination, citing Guerra v. Manchester Terminal Corp., 498 F.2d 641 (5th Cir. 1974). To be sure, MALDEF wishes such was the state of the law. Unfortunately, at least two circuits have rejected the Guerra analysis and hold § 1981 does not provide a remedy against alienage discrimination, see DeMalherbe v. International Elevator Construction, 438 F.Supp. 1121 (N.D.Cal. 1977).

However, it is interesting that your staff has concluded that Guerra settles the issue and provides a remedy against alienage discrimination, yet does not support codifying the Guerra holding to explicitly prohibit alienage discrimination.

In any event, the dispute between circuits and legal scholar makes the law unclear, this should be clarified with language making alienage discrimination unlawful.

3. The problem of alienage discrimination is a real problem and prevents legally admitted resident aliens from many employment opportunities. We present a number of examples in the enclosed report.

4. It is clear from the House debates and from the Conference Committee debates that there is a consensus that any employer sanctions provision must include some form of anti-discrimination measures. The extent of the discrimination problem, and the extent of the measures needed to remedy the problem must be examined fully in a hearing on the issue. You yourself cited the lack of hearings on the issue as the reason for your reluctance to agree to many of the anti-discrimination measures proposed by the House conferees. How can you now proceed to a markup without having held at least one day of hearings on the discrimination issue?

It is important to note the problem of discrimination is not a "Hispanic" problem. While most of the examples delineated in our report involve Hispanics, many other immigrant groups will face discrimination of different sorts as a result of S. 1200: Asians, Haitians, Israelis, Poles, Pakistans and others.

It is also important to note that alienage discrimination also affects persons with different kinds of legal statuses. Refugees legally admitted to the U.S. are eligible, and encouraged to work and support themselves. Persons who apply for legalization may be required to be employed to avoid exclusion under the "public charge" provision. Permanent resident aliens who have waited patiently for legal admittance should also be allowed full opportunities in the work place.

To create a law which will cause employers to scrutinize and reduce the employment of aliens without adequate protections from such discrimination is bad enough, but to proceed with such legislation and not even hold hearings on the discriminatory impact of the legislation and the extent of anti-discrimination protection is unfair.

I, therefore, ask that you carefully consider the analysis and conclusions of the report; and I again respectfully request that hearings or consultations be held on the issue of discrimination.

Respectfully submitted,
RICHARD P. FAJARDO,
Acting Associate Counsel.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURKOWSKI). The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, again that has been a thoughtful review of a tough and puzzling issue. I remember well the Hart-Levin amendment or the Levin-Hart amendment in the last debate on this issue. What we are talking about is a new set of machinery in the Federal Government, a set of machinery that was rejected in previous civil rights legislation. I think that is what people want to remember here. This is in essence, if I am not mistaken, and I ask the sponsors if I could be corrected, the Frank amendment or great parts of the Congressman Barney Frank amendment, my former colleague from Massachusetts. Is that not what is embodied here?

Mr. HART. My recollection of the sponsorship in the House is not quite clear, but it is the amendment passed overwhelmingly by the House.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank my friend and neighbor from Colorado. It was presented to the House on the basis that it was an antidiscriminatory piece of legislation, and indeed it is. It passed overwhelmingly very late one evening after another significant vote that preceded it. That is the Hart-Levin amendment proposal.

I say to you that the machinery in it, and what it creates, a separate system within the Government, a separate agency, was rejected during the civil rights debates of the past or it would have been part of the civil rights laws of the present.

I have always resisted it on the basis that if we are going to do civil rights legislation, let us do it, but let us not do it on an immigration reform bill where now, especially with what Senator KENNEDY has proposed and I have agreed to, there is a remarkable assurance that discrimination will not take place.

Again, I want to be sure that everyone is hearing clearly what we are talking about. We are not talking about discrimination based upon color of skin or national origin. Those things have been covered so magnificently by Congress in the past and will in the future remain covered.

We are talking about the thing called discrimination based on alienage, which is puzzling to scholars, and so, in a sense, vague, that some of the great civil libertarians of both Houses of Congress have not even dealt with it in the past 20 years. That is what makes it such an extraordinary, puzzling issue.

To do it in an example form so that people really do understand what we are talking about is very simple: I am an employer and two people are standing before me for a job. One is a United States citizen and the other a Canadian with a green card allowing him to work in the United States. I pick the U.S. citizen. I am subjected to a suit through the machinery of my Government by the permanent resident alien on the basis that I have discriminated against him or her on the basis of their alienage.

I do not think the American people are ready to favorably consider that and its ramifications.

The other ramification is if you have a colony of permanent resident aliens who like to hire permanent resident aliens, they will no longer be able to do that. They must hire U.S. citizens.

That is why we are going to have a hearing on it—because it is absolutely necessary we have a hearing on it. That is going to be a joint hearing. Congressman MAZZOLI and I are going to hold that hearing. It is my understanding it has been set.

I wish it could have been done before we proceeded on this bill, but all of us who have legislated know that as these windows flop open and close in this curious arena, you grab the hook as it goes by. We are going to be on the farm bill and the Superfund, and so on. The immigration window opened and we proceeded.

I have assured my colleague for Michigan and I assure my colleague from Colorado that will have another window for presentation of their concerns after we review the transcript of that hearing—either a resolution, a sense-of-the-Senate resolution, or whatever may be required to address the issue of discrimination based on alienage. The proposed amendment deals with both national origin and alienage discrimination. The bill, especially as amended by Senator KENNEDY, offers extensive protection against national origin discrimination:

First, an employee who complies with the verification procedures is afforded an affirmative defense against the penalties.

Second, an employer who wishes to discriminate is still subject to the penalties of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Third, the bill requires GAO to monitor the implementation of employer sanctions and report on any discrimination.

Fourth, if a pattern of discrimination arises, an antidiscrimination task force must develop legislative recommendations that are reviewed by the Congress in 60 days.

The ultimate solution is the new antidiscrimination procedure: Special provisions to permit the Congress to act to repeal or amend employer sanctions in a 30-day expedited procedure.

Mr. HART. If the Senator will yield, by way of response, first, I hope and I am sure the Senator from Wyoming did not intend to say that he sensed that the American people were not ready to address this issue, that we as parliamentarians and political leaders should address it, so far as the situation with respect to civil liberties is concerned. We have taken an oath to address issues of that sort to protect even one individual if a constitutional right is in question. In this case, this amendment is designed to address constitutional rights. So I do not think the Senator from Wyoming would want to press hard the argument that he senses that the American people are not willing or prepared for us to face this issue. That is beside the point.

Second, at issue here is not the good will and intention of the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Massachusetts. In fact, if we all could be assured that every discrimination question under this bill would be addressed by a forum of Senator SIMPSON and Senator KENNEDY, I think we would be satisfied that questions of discrimination would be fairly judged and liberties would be guaranteed. But we are going to turn this bill over to an administration of nameless and faceless people who may not have the same good intentions as the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Massachusetts. So what their intentions are, in the long run, so far as the individual on the street is concerned who is looking for a job, will matter very little.

Finally, to say that this machinery was considered in civil rights legislation in the 1960's and was rejected is irrelevant, with all due respect, to the argument before us. During the civil rights debates, we were not discussing labor relations or employer sanctions. We are discussing them now. All civil rights issues for all time were not resolved in the 1960's. As we legislate the rights and interests of citizens and noncitizens for years to come, we will have to address civil rights problems.

Even though the machinery created by this bill, not a bureaucracy but a limited capability, might not have been accepted in the 1960's, it does not mean that it should not be accepted in the 1980's in conjunction with new legislation affecting civil rights and liberties of citizens and noncitizens in this country.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would only add that we have given to permanent resident aliens the right to work in this country, the right to be employed. That is our promise to them when we give them the card, and we must meet that commitment.

What I say again to the Senator is that the American people would have difficulty understanding why you cannot have the hiring of a U.S. citizen over a permanent resident alien. You may not agree with that, but I submit that that has some bearing out in the real world, which is very simply addressed to the constituents that the Senator and I know from the West. For example: "What do you mean, I can't hire a U.S. citizen over a permanent resident alien if I want to and not have the Government sue me?" That is what I am speaking of.

Mr. HART. This amendment does not prevent that.

Mr. SIMPSON. This amendment indeed leads to that, and I have a problem with that.

The issue is that you do have to hire a permanent resident alien who is entitled to work right next to a citizen, but you do not need an entirely new Special Counsel of the United States of America, an agency-sized bureaucracy, and that is exactly what this amendment proposes. It is a Special Counsel system that has been presented each time during the civil rights debates and has been rejected each time in the civil rights debates. That is what I want to express; that is what I want to make clear.

If we are talking about the civil rights of the United States and the status of civil rights problems, the most grievous one in the United States is having no legislation. The most grievous civil rights violations in the United States in this area are taking place because we have nothing on the books. It is legal to hire an illegal, but it is illegal for an illegal to work. That is the law of the United States.

There are 2 to 12 million human beings wandering around in a never-never land, who are afraid to go to a hospital, except for a birth, afraid to go to an employer because they will be bounced out on their can. They are left out of consideration each time we try to kill this legislation. So do not miss the whole issue on immigration reform.

Mr. HART. I am sure the Senator knows that those sponsoring this amendment are not trying to defeat this bill. If we were, we would be arguing against the bill, and we are not doing that.

We are not trying to prevent a situation in which an employer can hire a citizen in this country and not be sued in the process. We are trying to avoid a situation where an employer gives the sanctions automatically, dismisses a resident alien who is entitled to work, and particularly in situations where that resident alien is brown, black, or Asian.

The Senator has admitted that this is a problem. He does not like our solution, but we have not yet heard anything that is.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have a magnificant solution which was adopted earlier this morning, and I hope we can see the naked truth, and we will follow it closely, which is our job.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. SIMON. As the Senator knows, I am new to this field, and I have been struggling with it. We are in the unusual situation of voting on a bill now and having hearings on the question of discrimination after we vote on the bill.

Candidly, I do not know whether the Hart-Levin amendment is the right answer or the wrong answer. But if we do not have some kind of tool to deal with this when we go to conference, we will be in an exceedingly awkward situation.

It seems to me that we ought to be putting something on the books here so that when we go to conference, we can deal with this issue. If we fail to do that, we are really ducking what I sense is a very fundamental problem.

I do not have good answers to the questions of the Senator from Wyoming. I do not know whether the Hart-Levin amendment provides good answers. I hope that in the hearing we will come up with some. But I do not want to see us go to conference saying this is not a problem and we are not going to do anything.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I have watched the work of the Senator from Illinois, and we are pleased to have him on the subcommittee. What he says is very authentic, and I hear it that way.

I wish it could be handled differently, but in this situation it could not be.

I assure the Senator, and it is obvious, that we are going to have a joint hearing on the issue of discrimination based on alienage. When we have it, it will be the first time in the history of the United States that we have held it. I have culled the records of the House of Representatives and I have culled the subcommittee's activities and the committee activities of a group of Congressmen of both parties, for whom I have the deepest respect, true civil libertarians; and there are about four paragraphs of references in the last 20 years to anything about discrimination based on alienage.

So it needs a full hearing, and it will have one. The House will have it before they proceed with immigration reform, and I know they will, because Representative RODINO has a bill, Representative LUNGREN has a bill, and Representative ROYBAL has a bill, and there are other bills they will process. They will deal with it. It will be the subject of conference activity, and it will be the subject of my activity, because I have assured Senator LEVIN that we will do something with it at the conclusion of the hearing.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to make that point.

I think it is important to all of us that we did get the assurance from the Senator from Wyoming and the majority leader the other night that there would be a legislative window prior to any conference, where we could offer a bill, a resolution, or a sense-of-the-Senate resolution we thought appropriate and which we could debate at that time.

A window has been assured to us, and we can thank the Senator from Wyoming and the majority leader for arranging that window and making it available. That is something. I think it is significant to us.

We all agree that the logic here would have been better served if we had the hearing first and then the debate on the floor. We have accommodated that reality the best we can.

The Senator from Colorado made one critical point: That it is not the question of whether an employer picks a citizen over an alien that is at issue here. The issue is the new element of employer sanctions and whether or not an employer might not hire an alien just because it is safer, rather than because he would rather hire a citizen. It is not the question of two people standing in front of the employer. It is one person standing in front of the employer. It is the legal alien standing alone in front of the employer, not with a citizen at his side and the choices being presented. But the employer, taking the safer route, would say, "I don't want to hire you anyway, because you're not a citizen, even though a citizen is not competing with you for the job."

I agree with the Senator that it is a puzzling situation, and I appreciate the problem as to where the American people would be with regard to the juxtaposition of the two. It is troubling to many of us.

The other point is that I hope the hearing will not only address the alienage issue, so-called, but also the gap in title VII coverage, because here I think there would be unanimity.

We do not want people discriminated against because they look or sound foreign. Title VII prohibits that under national origin discrimination provisions, but it does not prohibit that for part-time workers, and it does not prohibit that for people who are applying to firms that hire less than 15 people.

So there are major gaps in the existing protections, and those protections, we find, will not be applicable; and we are very much concerned about any additional national origin discrimination which might be created as a result of these sanctions which would not have a remedy under title VII. I hope my friend will include that in the hearings which are coming up.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I can assure you that that will come into play simply because of the confusion of terms. When we talk about discrimination based on alienage, people think we are talking about discrimination based on national origin. We have a most extraordinarly well-developed record on discrimination based on national origin, ethnicity, and color of skin. That is what we have been up to. That is what I have been up to for 4½ years. I have had 10 hearings or more, held by the subcommittee in the last 4½ years, that deal with discrimination based upon national origin, ethnicity, and color of skin.

It has been part of the civil rights debate for many years before I came here. There is no question about that. Information about a job applicant's alien status is not relevant to employer sanctions; only the employee's illegal alien status is what we are talking about with employer sanctions.

If an applicant can show citizen status, the employer will not be subject to sanctions for hiring the applicant. However, neither will the employer be subject to sanctions if he hires an applicant who can show legal alien status. That is what the bill says. That is what is here.

Therefore, knowledge of an applicant's alienage will not cause an employer who has no desire to discriminate against illegal aliens to begin to do so. But I assure my colleague that I will keep that in mind and embrace that as we go on into the hearing process in future legislation.

I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to indicate that I fully support the objectives of the amendment offered by Senators HART and LEVIN. I also share the view of Senator SIMPSON that it is an extremely complex issue which came up late in the last Congress and helped to stall the conference committee's consideration of the immigration bill. Its full implications could not be determined.

That's why joint hearings have been scheduled, at my and several Senators' request, next week. I regret we had to begin consideration of this bill before we got the benefit of these hearings—but they are scheduled, and we will have the benefit of their results before final action on this legislation is taken by the House conference committee.

So, Mr. President, I support the objectives of the amendment and I am still hopeful we can work out a compromise.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I would just like to offer a few remarks while we are on the issue of discrimination, which is likely to result from the employer sanctions provisions of this bill.

A major concern of mine regarding S. 1200 deals with the lack of adequate protections to those American citizens who do not "look American," in particular those of Hispanic descent.

I am sure my colleagues are in agreement that we are opposed to discrimination and that we do not want more to occur as a result of this legislation.

However, I am not assured that we have afforded the necessary civil liberty protections to our minority Americans.

S. 1200 relies on the use of employer sanctions as a means to deter the influx of illegal aliens, and I agree that some method of deterrence must be instituted. But I believe that S. 1200 as now written takes this approach in the national interest, at the expense of individual constitutional rights.

Having recognized the possibility of discrimination, I believe we have an obligation to these Americans to take action now to minimize that possibility and to provide a reasonable process for redress of grievances that will surely arise.

Because of this concern I and several of my colleagues requested of the distinguished chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee a hearing on the issue of employer sanctions and discrimination.

I am very pleased that Senator SIMPSON has agreed to a joint hearing on September 18, next Wednesday, however it appears that we will be voting on final passage of S. 1200 without the benefit of that hearing record.

Therefore, at a minimum we need to improve what is in S. 1200 and I rise in support and am a cosponsor of Senator HART'S amendment to try and achieve some recourse for those who feel a violation of their rights due to employer sanctions.

As a Senator who comes from a State with a 1,950-mile border with Mexico, I am well aware of the opportunities and problems this situation creates. The problems are considerable: Air and water pollution, violence, drug trafficking, depressed economic conditions, and what we are trying to address today; immigration control and access.

I have serious reservations about the workability of employer sanctions and their unintended impacts, and I believe that we are only beginning to hear about the "weeding out" of illegal aliens by employers. I would hope that this body would give serious thought to supporting Senator HART'S amendment.

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, it is certainly not the intention of those offering the amendment to defeat or hinder much-needed reform in the area of immigration legislation. Someday, hopefully soon, legislation will pass which is fair and balanced and the Senator from Wyoming will receive the credit he deserves for the years of long toil he has put into one of the most vexing public policy problems and challenges this country faces.

The sponsors of this amendment simply seek to avoid the situation where, once that day comes, either on an individual case basis or, even worse, or a firestorm basis, unintended consequences of this legislation lead to either wholesale discrimination of legal residents of this country, regardless of what the Senator says, primarily because of the color of their skin or the fact that they come from a nonwhite part of the world or an equally challenging situation of the sole individual who is discriminated against unfairly and unjustly. The Senator from Wyoming does not want that, nor do the sponsors of this amendment.

The sponsors of this amendment also do not want a highly negative vote on an issue we merely wish to preserve for the future. We do not wish to give up on this fight, as the Senator from Michigan said. The Senator from Wyoming very graciously agreed that the near term situation is required to guarantee that right.

I think the Senator from Michigan agrees that putting this question to a vote at this time and perhaps not receiving a majority vote or a strong vote in its favor might jeopardize that case. Therefore, with the agreement of the cosponsor of the Senator from Michigan, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado and I shall surely work with him to achieve the goal he speaks of, as I shall with the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment No. 606 was withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 607

(Purpose: To prohibit an officer or employee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service from entering a farm without a properly executed warrant)

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE], for himself and Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. BINGAMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 607:

On page 116, between lines 16 and 17, insert the following:

SEC. 304. POWERS OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Section 287 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1357) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section (other than paragraph (3) of subsection (a)), in the enforcement of this act an officer or employee or the Service may not enter onto the premises of a farm or other agricultural operation without a properly executed warrant."

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, this amendment to the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985 (S. 1200) would require the Immigration and Naturalization Service [INS] to obtain a properly executed search warrant prior to entering a farm or other agriculture operation.

Currently, INS agents must obtain a warrant before entering any place of business with the exception of farms and ranches. This exception must not be allowed to continue. Farmers should be afforded the same rights and standards of protection that every other businessman enjoys under the fourth amendment of our Constitution which guarantees protection from unreasonable search and seizure.

Similarly, every farm worker is entitled to the same protection as every other worker in our society against the disruption that occurs when there is unwarranted and sometimes warrantless—without warrant—search of farm premises.

Simply because a farm is an easy mark offering the simplest and most cost efficient means of reaching quota objectives is no reason to apply a different set of rules. The lack of a search warrant requirement allows INS agents to concentrate their enforcement activities on agriculture, where 8 to 15 percent of the illegals in the country are currently employed. Although this small amount of undocumented workers are employed in agriculture, fully 50 percent of undocumented workers picked up by INS agents in the interior of the country are captured while working in agricultural occupations.

These figures show a distinct bias in INS enforcement activities and serve notice that farmers and farm workers are not receiving equal protection as envisioned in our Constitution. The INS contends that farm lands are "open fields" and their agents need not obtain consent or show probable cause that some criminal activity is occurring prior to entering a farmer's fields. Simply because they see a group of people working in a field, they operate under the assumption that those people have gained entry into the United States illegally. It is not until the agents enter the field that an illegal versus legal status can be determined.

Harassment of agricultural employers and employees by the INS has gone on for years. Harvesting operations have been disrupted when time was of the essence merely by the proximity of INS agents.

My amendment does not establish protection or set a precedent for farmers; it just guarantees them the same rights and privileges enjoyed by every other employer in our Nation. Likewise, employees will be protected from the humiliation of impulsive interrogation by the INS.

This legislation is needed, it has been passed by this body before by a vote of 2 to 1. It continues to be needed. Our system has failed in an important civil obligation, and if we are to live under the guaranteed proposition of the fourth amendment we must now take steps to correct this blatant injustice.

Mr. President, I do not intend to take long in the debate of this amendment because I believe all Members of the Senate are aware of the issues that are presented by the amendment and desire to correct it. While I understand that the Senator from Wyoming, the manager of the bill, will oppose the amendment upon the entreaty of the INS, I think it is important if we are going to have civil liberties guaranteed in this country that indeed, we should pass this amendment. This amendment has been cosponsored by original cosponsors DECONCINI, GRAMM, SYMMS, CRANSTON, and BINGAMAN. It is a bipartisan proposal on the part of those who joined me in this in an effort to guarantee that the civil liberties of those who work in the fields are just as important as the civil liberties of those who work in the factories.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am happy to support the amendment offered by Senator MCCLURE to require that our Nation's farms be treated just like other businesses and our Nation's farmworkers be treated just like other workers.

The amendment would require that agents of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and Border Patrol obtain a search warrant before they enter the premises of a farm or other outdoor agricultural operation. This amendment would overturn the so-called open fields doctrine which both agencies currently follow.

Before INS or Border Patrol agents enter a business such as a restaurant or textile mill, they must comply with the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and obtain a search warrant. Search warrants are thus required in all industries other than agriculture. Contrary to common belief, these other industries employ the vast majority of illegal aliens employed in the United States. It is estimated that only 15 percent of employed illegal aliens are employed in agriculture. Yet 50 percent of the apprehensions occur in agriculture. It is obvious that INS and the Border Patrol have singled out agriculture for a much higher proportion of their attention because it is simply easier to apprehend people if you do not have to have a search warrant to enter the property on which they work.

This singling out of agriculture for special treatment is unfair to both the employees and the owners. In my opinion, it is also a violation of their constitutional rights.

Opponents of this amendment will argue that the "open fields" doctrine has been upheld by the Supreme Court. That decision, however, was rendered in a case involving the growing of illegal substances—marijuana—in a field, not the investigation of the presence of illegal aliens.

I contend there is a big difference between entering a field because you have a reasonable suspicion that illegal drugs are being grown there and entering a field simply because the workers on it have brown skin or a national origin from south of our border. The open fields doctrine as currently interpreted by INS and the Border Patrol does not require that agents have any probable cause to believe that illegal activity is taking place. There is no standard or requirement of probable cause.

There have been repeated instances of injuries and even deaths occurring to aliens fleeing these open field searches. These instances could be curtailed if the employer was allowed to participate in the search upon presentation of a search warrant as is the case in other businesses.

Opponents of the search warrant amendment have been unable to show that it will hinder legitimate enforcement activities. Several studies, including a recent one conducted by the National Center for State Courts, have shown that obtaining search warrants is not a deterrent to effective law enforcement.

The INS is busy outside the Chamber trying to buttonhole Members to insist that this amendment is going to curtail their ability to apprehend illegal aliens. The requirement of a search warrant does not hamper their efforts in all other business. The INS does not want to give proper Constitutional rights either to owners or to the potential undocumented aliens in agriculture. I have to conclude that they have accepted, perhaps unwillingly, the constitutional requirement to obtaining a search warrant whenever entering or desiring to enter any other businesses for the purpose of inspecting to see if illegal aliens are present.

Mr. President, I believe that it is important that our agricultural operations be treated equitably with other businesses.

I urge my colleagues to join in support of Senator MCCLURE's amendment and I am pleased that he has offered it once again.

I truly hope that the manager of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, could see fit to accept this amendment, I know how strongly he feels about law enforcement and civil rights. I think that this amendment is consistent with his strong civil rights position and I am sure that he does not want a discrepancy as to the use of a warrant.

So I urge my colleagues and the manager of the bill to accept the amendment.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it is a harrowing position to rise in opposition to the American Farm Bureau and the American Civil Liberties Union. You really have a difficult time when you get into that particular pair of pliers. I have been there before and may return to the fray somewhat emaciated and decimated after we get through with this amendment, but I am going to speak against it anyway because I feel very strongly that even though I agree with the intensity and the feeling that is expressed, the fourth amendment limitation on unreasonable searches and seizures does not require a warrant to enter open fields.

The fourth amendment of the Constitution protects against unreasonable searches and seizures of "persons, houses, papers, and effects." And the Supreme Court, in April 1984, under the case of Oliver versus United States, ruled that the requirement for a search warrant does not apply to open fields.

There is absolutely no constitutionally protected right of privacy regarding open fields. Extending protection to open fields is not what drafters of the fourth amendment intended, and it would affect many areas of law enforcement.

The INS is not the only agency that is allowed to enter open fields without a warrant. I believe both Senator MCCLURE and Senator DECONCINI were prosecutors in their other lives. We have drug enforcement agency people who require searches of open fields without a warrant. We have local police who may enter open fields to look for drugs as was the situation in the Oliver case. We have officers of State, municipal, and local government, and Federal agencies who need to have a warrantless search of open fields, not just for workers and particularly agricultural workers, but to check for drug abuse situations, for burial of corpus delicti, other things such as that, or pursue a landing airplane suspected of carrying illegal substances or illegal aliens which is the norm now.

But let me share with you, as I conclude my arguments against the amendment, the INS does already require a warrant. They require a warrant to enter any factory, any business, or any residence. And this is important: They require a warrant to go into any farm house, any barn, any packing shed, any farmyard, and any other building contained in an outdoor agricultural operation. They require a warrant.

That was recently reaffirmed in a case in the ninth circuit this year, Le Duc versus Nelson.

This amendment would severely hamper the INS's ability to enforce immigration laws, while the American public overwhelmingly supports an end to illegal immigration.

The amendment, I think, sets a dangerous precedent for other law enforcement efforts, particularly for narcotics and controlled substances violations.

I guess the real irony for me is this: Under S. 1200 or under the proposal yesterday, we are trying to do something for agriculture employers. We are trying to do something important so they can stay in business with perishable crops, not so very important perhaps with regard to the six basic commodities. We all recognize that in the debate.

Agricultural employers here, then, are at the point where they are requesting special Federal assistance. Unless I am missing something, this is what they are requesting, and they are getting—through S. 1200—special Federal assistance in obtaining agricultural labor. That is what we are up to. Then they come conversely and deny the INS and the Federal Government the ability to monitor the special programs which we will give them under this legislaiton. That is the true irony of the situation.

Finally, the civil rights activists apparently are claiming that the INS enters open fields merely at the sight of brown-skinned people working in the field, and that then such a discriminatory practice can be remedied by a search warrant requirement.

It is a very interesting statement, and I believe Senator McCLURE has stated that every other businessman enjoys protection under the fourth amendment. That statement is only true if the employer conducts his business indoors because if the employer conducts his business out-of-doors, then he does not have the fourth amendment protection as would the owner of a construction firm, as would a person as we showed in the debate last year where two blocks from this Capitol they arrested a construction work force and half of them were illegal, undocumented persons—that is two blocks from the U.S. Capitol—as we failed to deal with immigration reform and those persons continue to be exploited.

So those working in outdoor, unsecured areas—from any industry or business—are not subject to the protection of the fourth amendment.

Remember again that only 8 to 15 percent of illegal, undocumented persons work in agriculture.

So I think it is inaccurate to believe that the INS is simply cruising open fields or roads near open fields. They do not. They act on tips from employees or on evidence the growers have established a pattern or practice of illegal alien employment.

A search warrant requirement will not stop such practices. It will just delay them, merely slow them up because, as the informers' tips are eventually verified, then the warrant is procured. It may take a little longer. And the further terrible irony, if you really are a civil libertarian, we find there are indeed employers who move those persons when they see that occurring, either voluntarily or involuntarily they move those persons. So that will not end it.

Although the amendment will require a warrant only for farms and other agricultural operations, it will be the first step, I think, for law enforcement officials to fear toward requiring of a search warrant for all open areas, and that is why the Justice Department and the Drug Enforcement Agency have opposed the amendment.

I also state to you that the International Association of Chiefs of Police and other law enforcement officers have again restated their opposition to the amendment. I am fully aware of the feeling about that. But I just thought we should share here what may take place; we may well injure some of the important things we have to do regarding drug abuse.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will indeed yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Idaho, Senator McCLURE. This amendment simply requires that agents of the INS obtain a search warrant before entering an open field.

For many years, farms have been an easy target for INS agents trying to meet a quota on illegals. Although less than 10 percent of the illegals in the country are employed in agriculture, over 50 percent of those taken into custody work on farms. The lack of a search warrant requirement has produced this unjustified and undesirable harassment of our Nation's farmers and farm employees.

The constitutionally guaranteed protection against unreasonable searches and seizures should not be applied selectively. All citizens have a right to that protection, and this amendment will preserve that right for the Nation's farmers and farmworkers.

Mr. President, there is not only a legal question at issue here but a human question as well. Anyone who has ever witnessed an INS raid can attest to the tremendous human tragedy involved.

When those agents enter a field, people fly in all directions like scared animals. Many flee because they face deportation and the loss of income to support their families. But many who flee are not illegal aliens; rather, they are U.S. citizens of Hispanic descent who simply panic at the sight of so many agents moving toward them. Moreover, many of those same U.S. citizens are frightened at the prospect of having to prove their citizenship.

For these reasons, I agree with my friend and colleague, Senator McCLURE, that the "open field" doctrine, under which these warrantless searches have been conducted, must be stopped. As the Senator noted in a recent letter:

> The open field doctrine is properly applicable, only to situations in which illegal activity or the "fruit of a crime" is clearly visible to law enforcement officials. The only thing that can be seen on farmland is people working in a field. To assume that they are doing so illegally because of the color of their skin and using this as justification for a warrantless entry onto private property, violates not only the farmer's rights but the farm worker's rights as well.

Mr. President, these warrantless searches are the only type of police-State activity of this nature allowed in the United States, and I commend Senator McCLURE for his efforts to correct this situation. I wholeheartedly support this amendment and urge its adoption by the Senate.

I thank the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment.

It strikes me that there is indeed an irony in this debate. Yesterday afternoon we consumed a considerable period of time engaged in lively debate on the subject of whether or not there is an adequate supply of domestic labor for the harvest of perishable commodities, and the critics of an amendment that would provide a seasonal worker program have protested that there is indeed and that such an amendment would threaten the livelihoods of Americans seeking to do stoop labor, apple pickers from Maine to Washington.

Now, is it not interesting that S. 1200, in affording this protection to the American farmer, targets them almost exclusively as a constituency for which the standard protections of the fourth amendment should be waived? And we are told that is justified on the basis of tips to the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

What this amounts to is a statement that those working in the fields can be presumed to be illegal aliens. That is the basis upon which it is deemed unnecessary to afford growers and those who work for them some special status that relieves us of any concern for their constitutional rights. We are to assume, notwithstanding the assurances yesterday afternoon that there is an abundant supply of domestic labor, meaning U.S. citizens, we are asked to assume that there is no need really to investigate, to justify what would otherwise be an illegal search and seizure, because we are, in effect, presuming that those working the fields are illegal aliens.

Mr. President, with friends like the U.S. Congress, farmers need few enemies. The kind of protections we are affording them through this legislation threaten to put them out of business. And without the saving amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, what they face is continual harassment.

The proponent tells us that we are supposed to simply assume that by virtue of the fact that this activity takes place out of doors that the routine protections afforded other Americans under the fourth amendment are unnecessary. Well, Mr. President, I think we should reject that out of hand.

I think it is clear that a special case is made by S. 1200, one that is not justified by the facts, one that asks us to discriminate against farmers, against those with brown skin. Frankly, I do not think that the U.S. Senate should go on record in support of such a proposition. So I urge my colleagues, if they are concerned with fairness, to vote for fairness by voting for the McClure amendment.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am a cosponsor of the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. I want to associate myself with his remarks. I think we need his amendment. It is a very important amendment to protect all sorts of rights in our society.

I also am delighted to associate myself with the remarks of my colleague from California, Senator WILSON, in regard to this amendment. I urge all of our colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the amendment before us would require that officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service obtain a search warrant prior to entering open fields to apprehend illegal aliens. It would ensure that farmers, ranchers, and farm and ranch workers are afforded the same protection against unreasonable and warrantless searches by INS agents as other businessmen and workers now enjoy. I rise in support of this amendment, which will remedy an injustice which results from the current law.

Under a Supreme Court case decided several years ago, agents of the INS are not required to secure search warrants before entering open fields. Currently, therefore, an INS agent must routinely obtain a search warrant before entering any place of business, except that place of business is a ranch or farm. The INS can raid the open fields of a farm or ranch without having probable cause to believe that the workers in those fields are illegal aliens.

This practice is arbitrary and discriminatory. It discriminates against ranches and farms and those people who work on ranches and farms. It severely disrupts farming operations, resulting in thousands of dollars in lost crops and man-hours annually.

The loophole that allows INS agents to enter farms and ranches without search warrants has led the INS to concentrate its enforcement efforts primarily on agriculture. While only 8 to 15 percent of the total number of illegal aliens in this country work on farms and ranches, nearly half of all INS apprehensions take place on farms and ranches. These figures reflect a distinct bias in INS enforcement activities against our ranch and farm industries.

A similar amendment was proposed to the immigration bill that was passed in 1983. I cosponsored that amendment, which was passed by a vote of 62 to 33. I am proud to cosponsor this amendment again. Let me add that this measure has been crafted so that it will not interfere with the ability of law enforcement agenices to enter fields where marijuana is being grown and seize those plants and arrest the growers. I encourage my fellow Senators to join me in voting in favor of this amendment to protect the rights of farmers, ranchers, and agricultural employees.

In closing let me thank the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE] for his tireless efforts on behalf of this amendment. His commitment to remedying the injustice that results from the current law is to be applauded. I am proud to join him in sponsoring this measure.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, I will be very brief. As I said in my opening remarks, I think almost everyone is familiar with the issue. I think most Senators have already made up their minds how they will vote. Indeed, most Senators, the last time it was before this body, voted in favor of the amendment by a margin of 2 to 1, and I hope they will do so again.

But I do wish to respond just this much to the remarks the distinguished Senator from Wyoming made earlier. One is that somehow open fields are open game for law enforcement agencies regardless of what the subject matter may be. And I submit that is not what the law says and that is not what the Supreme Court said. In the Oliver case, they were dealing with the question of growing crops, plants growing in the field, marijuana plants in that particular instance. They were not talking about human beings' presence there and the search of the premises for people. They were talking about the search of the premises for growing plants. And there is a reason to make that distinction.

The reason I make it now is obviously to differentiate between law enforcement activities where they are trying to find growing plants and law enforcement activities when they are trying to determine the presence of illegal aliens.

But there is a similar tie to that. How do drug enforcement agencies find growing marijuana plants? They drive down the road or they fly over the field and they see something different and they immediately enter that field before it can be removed. Growing plants can be cut down and removed, and without a warrant they can do that. Typically, however, they probably discover evidence by a tip or otherwise and could get a search warrant and go there before the plants could be removed.

But we have carefully and narrowly focused this amendment so it does not deal with that question at all. It deals only with the enforcement of the provisions of this act. It does not extend to drug enforcement activities.

The second point that I think is valid in that connection is that indeed, as the Senator from Wyoming indicated, I probably would have said, or other people have said, that INS officials driving down the road see a work crew and stop and enter the field to determine their identity. Mr. President, they do that if the work force in the field does not have white skin. But if they have white skin, they just drive on. There is an invidious discrimination toward people who are not white skinned if they happen to be working in the field.

The Senator from Wyoming indicates, "Well, the same thing will happen. They just will get a warrant first and it will happen a few hours later."

Well, Mr. President, that is not necessarily true. Let me give you some information that has been given to me about some things that happened earlier this year in the State of Washington. And it did happen this year.

INS agents entered a farm in Othello, WA, four times in 1 month to search for what they suspected to be undocumented workers. Their last three trips into the field, without a search warrant, produced no undocumented workers. But, despite the fact it produced no undocumented workers, they did arrest two. And who did they arrest? Two Japanese citizens. Brown skinned, not white. They were arrested. What were they? They were agricultural exchange students from Japan who had a lawful right to be in the country. They entered the field to get to people who were not of white skin. They found some. They arrested them. They happened to be legally present, but they were not illegal aliens.

INS agents entered a field in Pasco, WA, for 29 straight days to search for undocumented workers.

On some occasions, the agents drove their trucks across the bean fields causing substantial damage to the bean crop.

Why should a farmer have to put up with that just because it happens that his workplace and his product is produced in a field rather than in a factory?

And remember that statistic a little earlier, that from 85 to 92 percent of the illegal aliens in this country are not employed in agriculture. They are employed elsewhere, where a search warrant is clearly required, and yet 50 percent of the arrests have been in agriculture because that is easier to do.

You do not have to get a search warrant. You do not have to have any more than a suspicion that somebody is there before you can then enter a field to harass the people who are there working.

Remember, this is not Government land that is being entered by Government agents. It is private land that is being entered without search warrants. If it were any other type of business or land in question, there could not be any entry on to the property. But because the INS believes that they have the right under the open field doctrine, they have the right to come on to the farmers' and ranchers' land as they please, it seems to me that we do have a need to act.

INS agents have used some of the most heavy-handed tactics in pursuit of what they believed to be undocumented workers. Neighbor farmers' fields have been entered by INS agents, again without a warrant, not where they were suspected to be but on the neighbor's land, in order to seal off the land of the farmer in question.

Entrances have been barred; fences and gates have been cut; workers, sometimes legal and sometimes illegal, have been handcuffed together and chained to trees. Why? Not because there is any presumption of guilt based upon anything other than the color of their skin and, upon occasion, because that worker does not speak English well.

I grew up in an area of Idaho where we depended upon seasonal farm labor as the labor demands during the year are uneven and worker demand at some periods of the year exceeds locally available labor.

Where did the workers come from? They came from Eagle Pass, TX. They were Hispanics, American citizens, most of whom did not speak English. Most of those who did speak English spoke with a heavy accent and spoke the English language poorly. Any INS agent would have perhaps been justified in asking whether or not they were illegal aliens. But just the color of their skin alone would make them suspect and, therefore, subject to the harassment that comes from a warrantless search. If INS has reasonable cause to believe, if they have a tip, that is sufficient; if they have information that leads them to believe, they can easily go to a magistrate, get a warrant, and enter those premises as they would if it were a packing shed or any other business enterprise.

As to the notion that has been suggested or only hinted at by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming that somehow you have to go get them now without a warrant because they will be moved before you can get to them if you do not, that simply defies reason. No farmer can simply move this crews around every hour on the hour or every half hour on the half hour, or any intermittent or short period of time without so disrupting the farming operation that it would be impossible for him to make any profit at all.

Mr. President, I sincerely believe that this amendment is both justified and necessary. I hope the Senate will once again vote in that manner when we vote on it.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficent second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will only take a moment of the Senate's time. I support this amendment. It seems to me that if this bill becomes law, the enforcement strategy of INS ought to be focused on the enforcement mechanisms provided in this legislation—the employer sanctions and in the other enforcement provisions which have been added by this legislation. That is where the focus of INS ought to be. That is the whole point of this legislation, to have employer sanctions as the new and principal enforcement strategy.

We have seen under court opinions in the past that if there are going to be INS sweeps, if they do it in the front office they have to get a search warrant. If they do it in the barn they have to get a search warrant. All the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is saying is if they do it in the fields they also ought to get a search warrant. He has made the case.

INS raids are subject, quite frankly, to the greatest kind of abuse—the most discriminatory kind of incidents. I think those are individuals who ought to be able to have some degree of protection because in so many instances, as the record has demonstrated, so many individuals who are subject to the kinds of actions of the INS are American citizens. They have constitutional rights. They ought to be protected. There ought to be a basic presumption in their favor because the overwhelming majority of those who do work in the fields are American citizens.

I think the case has been well made. I think this amendment will be an addition to the bill. I hope the amendment will be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 39, as follows:

So the amendment (No. 607) was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 608

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON] proposes an amendment numbered 608:

On page 89, line 15, before the period insert the following: "or, such documents provided under clause (i) may include a rent receipt, bank book, utility bill, or an affidavit from a credible witness (such as a parish priest)."

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I supported the reasonable approach to legalization offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] this morning which reflected the considered judgment of the conference committee on this bill.

I regret the outcome of the vote on that. My interest stems from the fact that 50 percent of the undocumented workers in this country are estimated to be in California.

How many? No one knows.

Two million? Six million? Whatever.

It is fair to say that the legalization program in this bill will benefit only a small number of them.

And then, only if they are willing to risk the gamble of coming forward.

But, having made the decision to legalize certain undocumented workers, why impose arbitrary, inflexible standards which prevent somebody who is qualified for permanent resident status from proving continuous residence, in the way that any other individual charged with a burden of proof, is entitled to prove a fact?

S. 1200 now expresses the preference for employment documentation as probably the most reliable kind of proof of continuous residence.

I do not disagree with that.

I just do not want to see that preference lead to the writing of a regulation that would exclude other forms of documentation and proof. I do not disagree with the statement that employment documentation is probably the most reliable.

All this innocuous little amendment will do is provide that in the event such proof is unavailable, a person seeking to be legalized may submit other reliable evidence of their continuous residence: rent receipts, bank books, paid utility bills, and, importantly, affidavits from credible witnesses such as the parish priest, among other possible documentation.

I cannot believe that my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], who has labored so long and hard over this bill in an effort to be fair, would not accept this amendment.

I am awaiting the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I apologize for not being more attentive. I try always to be attentive when my colleagues are proposing amendments, especially if I am opposed to them. But that may not be so here.

If I understand the purpose of the Senator's amendment, it is to expand the forms of documentation that are permitted to prove residence in the United States. This is rent receipts, bank books, utility bills, individual affidavits——

Mr. CRANSTON. From credible people like the parish priest.

I agree with the statement in the measure that the best and most reliable kind of proof is employment documentation. I do not quarrel with that. But other forms can be reliable.

Let me just add if I may that it may well be that proof of employment is not available to someone who has quite convincing other forms of proof. Part of my concern is that the statement in the measure stressing the importance of employment documentation might lead to regulations that would bar other forms of evidence. I think that would be very unfair and very unfortunate.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I started off a bit facetiously and I do wish to correct that. It is a serious amendment, and I think it deserves a serious response.

Let me tell you the problems with it and why. We are already going to have cottage industry in rent receipts and W-2 forms when we get to legalization. There is not any question. Anyone who does not believe that is missing what will happen.

Legalization is a pretty priceless gift we are extending from an extraordinarily generous people. So we are going to have that.

As I see this amendment, it would encourage an absolute hailstorm of funny paper and phony paper and unverified documents, and it would not be that way, of course, with a credible person. When you are talking about staying in the United States of America or legal residence, then indeed that is something that makes people do a lot of things to stretch the law.

Let me just say that I think the incentive for fraud in proving eligibility for legalization is already extraordinary. May we have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is right. There will be order in the Senate. We will not continue until there is order.

The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, with regard to Senator CRANSTON's amendment, the incentive for fraud in proving eligibility for legalization is already great. In fact, it is extraordinary.

I think this amendment increases this incentive manyfold because S. 1200 in its present form requires independent corroboration of documents showing evidence of a person's presence in the United States since a certain date and many employment related documents are preferred under S. 1200.

Employment documents then prove a person's existence in a certain place for a certain period of time. Rent receipts and utility receipts and bills merely prove that a certain fee was paid to someone for a certain service or item, and they are not nearly as reliable.

I think a personal affidavit is a means of corroborating evidence on a document but certainly no substitute for the document itself as this amendment would provide.

I think, as we all know and we see in our daily lives the use of receipts, those who wish to gimmick the use of receipts have an excellent opportunity every time they take a cab ride. The cabby will hand you the receipt with the date and his name and the blank left which is an interesting thing. I do not know what it does for the cabby. I know what it does for the rider. He uses it or fills in the term or the amount if he chooses to do so.

Allowing personal affidavits, however, would also create in my opinion an incredible potential for fraud, for individuals could go into the business of being credible witnesses. I can almost imagine a credible affidavit shop for the right fee. We have it in marriage fraud. I just hesitate. I know that does not have a thing to do with what my friend from California has in mind. I see it as something very much like Senator ALAN CRANSTON—compassionate approach to what could be a problem. But I also see it as something that could be terribly, terribly abused. The legalization program is already rather unpopular in the public eye. We had a little more evidence of that.

If it is not to appear thoroughly bankrupt, I think we have to assure that the program does not just die or drown in a blizzard of easy to counterfeit, difficult to verify paper.

I would resist that amendment indeed.

Mr. CRANSTON. I wish to respond briefly just to say it would seem to me that all that the Senator from Wyoming has said about various forms of evidence or nonevidence of residence in the United States would apply to documents indicating employment. An employer would have a particular incentive to cooperate in forging of documents were they desirous of doing so because they would have a motive. They have an employee perhaps they would like to keep in this country even though that person is not here legally.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would emphasize that there is nothing in the bill to prevent the Attorney General from approving rent receipts or utility bills as documentation, if employment documents are not available. That is if they are not available. The bill says that the Attorney General shall decide just what documentation will be acceptable so long as employment documents are used first if they are available. I would think that would handle what I certainly know and I believe is intended.

Under the circumstances, I would certainly reject the amendment. I would be glad to work with the Senator later on it. We can change perhaps some certain language. But at the present time, I just cannot see us going to a blizzard of documents by people who are in extremity, and they are in extremity because they are looking for this extraordinary act of legalization. We want to have appropriate employment documents. If they are not available, the Attorney General is able to go to these others, but I hate to put that in the law that we actually name a rent receipt, a bank book, a utility bill or individual affidavits which could be nothing more than all sorts of various subjects of abuse.

I hope the Senator might consider withdrawing the amendment. But I do not know how he feels about that.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I withheld asking for the yeas and nays hoping that we would be able to find this acceptable. But since we are unable to, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to just add: I understand the concerns by the Senator from Wyoming. I know he has endeavored to be fair in all that he has sought to get into this bill. But what will be at issue on whether or not someone has been in this country for a time is a question of fact, and it seems to me that we should permit those seeking to establish their right to be in this country to present all the facts that would substantiate their case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to table.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from California.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, on this motion to table, I have voted yea. Were he able to be present, although he is necessarily absent, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY] would have voted no. I respectfully ask that I might enter a live pair with him in that regard.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 608 was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I wish to ask at this time as to what the program for the rest of the day may be, and with particular regard to rollcall votes and amendments, if the distinguished assistant Republican leader is in a position to respond.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I say to the minority leader that I appreciate his patience. I very much appreciate his patience as we have dealt with this rather complex legislation.

There is a time agreement being distributed, or at least sought, which might provide that we would have perhaps one additional rollcall vote—we may even be able to avoid that—which would be a time agreement that all amendments which are presently pending at the desk will be processed, either this evening by those who wish to process them, and I hope you would, or certainly perhaps on Monday, which is a day of no votes. No votes will be held on Monday but it will certainly be a day when we will be in business.

With that, we would then proceed to have a rollcall vote on Tuesday on all amendments, together with anything that might be involved with Senator WILSON and Senator HATCH, whatever that may be. No amendments would be available after Monday. The amendments would be stacked until Tuesday at a time certain, beginning at approximately 10 o'clock, with final passage of the bill at a time certain after the conclusion or disposition of the stacked amendments.

That is a time agreement which is being sought. My fellow manager of the bill and I are ready to proceed. There might be, as I say, one more rollcall vote. There may not be. In any event, we are seeking that kind of accommodation so that we would be available for a while more this evening, but those not involved in the amendments could be released, or leave the Chamber, the community, or whatever.

We would be here to process amendments on Monday but that would be it. There would be no amendments to the amendments and the debate would go on. That is being sought.

Mr. BYRD. I am willing to be helpful in any way I can be to work out the matter.

Mr. CRANSTON. In regard to the proposed agreement, I would like to find a way to accommodate a need I may have but may not have. Senator D'AMATO has an amendment on a formula for distribution of funds. If that carries, I will not have an amendment to offer. If it does not carry, I might have an amendment I would like to offer as an alternative. I would like to have that right reserved.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will certainly add that to the time agreement. The Senator says that is significant only as it relates to a pending amendment?

Mr. CRANSTON. That is right.

Mr. SIMPSON. Very well.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized, but I say to the Senator from Florida that the Senator from Nebraska would like to be yielded to.

Mr. HEINZ. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I am going to present an amendment that will be accepted, but I will wait.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the managers of the bill?

I am at a point where I am prepared to offer the amendment that I earlier proposed to offer. I have not yet sent it to the desk, and I want to ask the managers of the bill whether they are prepared for this amendment or would prefer that it be offered and considered at another time. I think we will be on the bill long enough for it to be taken up either later today or on Monday and voted on Tuesday.

Mr. BUMPERS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania intend to offer his amendment today or Monday?

Mr. HEINZ. I want to get a sense from Senator SIMPSON as to whether he would want the amendment voted on today or on Tuesday. I want to accommodate him, because he has been on the floor for a long time and will be here longer. If he has another amendment that he thinks will be disposed of quickly, I will not offer this amendment now.

I say to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming, that I believe this amendment will not draw any serious opposition. I have had lengthy discussions with Senators CHILES and DOMENICI, so that at least there will be the opportunity, should the Senate so desire, to preserve some aggregate accounting but still separate Social Security from the unified Federal budget.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania: I understand that it has something to do with his committee work, that he feels he requires this type of indication from the Senate as to the sense of the Senate on this issue. Is that correct?

Mr. HEINZ. That is correct. The Finance Committee will be taking up, among other things, budget reconciliation on Tuesday next.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that would mean that if we were to obtain a vote on this issue on Tuesday morning, that would be sufficient for the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Is that correct?

Mr. HEINZ. It would, if the amendment were taken up early on Tuesday.

Mr. SIMPSON. I think that is important as a matter of comity; 88 Senators voted on the last amendment, and from my knowledge at this outpost, I think the number will continue to decline swiftly. I think we are entitled to give our colleagues a vote on serious issues; 88 Senators voted on the last amendment, which is really quite admirable. But I am still fishing for the time agreement.

There are about four more amendments. Senator MOYNIHAN has an amendment which will be accepted. I do not have the complete list. Senator METZENBAUM has one on which I think we can reach an accommodation. I understand that he may press for a rollcall vote on another amendment. There is a Wilson amendment, a Simon amendment which may require a rollcall vote, a Levin amendment which may require a rollcall vote, an Exon amendment. That is it. I think rollcall votes will be required if we cannot reach an accommodation. Is that correct?

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, does the Senator from Pennsylvania still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I renew my request for some direction from the chairman of the committee. It would be the Senator's preference to offer the amendment right now, but I want to accommodate the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. What is the inquiry?

Mr. HEINZ. It is my preference to offer the amendment now, but I am willing not to offer it at this time but later or on Monday, depending on what suits the preference of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have one more amendment that will require a rollcall vote this evening. As to the rest of them, I will accommodate the sponsors of the amendment to either do it this evening or Monday and stack the votes—and that is what I am seeking to do—for Tuesday morning beginning at 10 o'clock, with no further amendments to be in order, and to have ad seriatim votes, with a certain time limit if that is appropriate. We have done that before with this legislation. There would be final passage thereafter. It would include the various amendments now pending which we will not dispose of this evening, including the amendment by Senator HEINZ.

Mr HEINZ. That is, if I offer my amendment tonight, we will get a vote on it tonight. Is that the intention of the Senator?

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope we might be flexible enough to allow the rollcall vote to occur Tuesday morning.

Mr HEINZ. I am flexible. We have to get unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. SIMPSON. We are looking for a unanimous-consent agreement to take the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania and other amendments and have a rollcall vote on Tuesday morning on those amendments. I hope his amendment would belong in that category.

I ask Senator METZENBAUM whether he would be averse to having the debate on his amendment, and if he requires a rollcall vote, would he have that on Tuesday morning?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have no objection, but I hope the Senator will accept my amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. The Senator is working toward that.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEINZ. I yield.

Mr. BUMPERS. With respect to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, so far as the unanimous-consent request which may be propounded along the lines suggested by the chairman is concerned, I want to reserve the right to offer either a perfecting amendment or an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the Heinz amendment. I am not sure that I will offer one, but nothing is at the desk; and I understood that the chairman said a moment ago that he wanted to vote on all the amendments that were at the desk and that no more amendments would be in order. Is the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania at the desk?

Mr. HEINZ. No, it is not.

Mr. BUMPERS. I would want to make a continuing objection so far as his amendment is concerned, to this extent: that I reserve the right to offer a perfecting amendment or an amendment in the nature of a substitute. Otherwise, I have no objection to the rest of the request.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEINZ. I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. As I understand it, the Senator's reservation is not really a reservation, because there is no unanimous-consent request pending. Is that correct?

Mr. BUMPERS. I was just making my views known.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, in an effort to accommodate the Senator from Wyoming, I yield the floor.

AMENDMENT NO. 609

(Purpose: To require the Attorney General to conduct a study on the use of a telephone verification system for determining employment eligibility in the United States)

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES] proposes an amendment numbered 609.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 38, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(g)(1) The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Health and Human Services, shall conduct a study for use by the Department of Justice in determining employment eligibility in the United States. Such study shall concentrate on those data bases that are currently available to the federal government which through the use of a telephone and computation capability could be used to verify instantly the employment eligibility status of job applicants.

(2) Such study shall be conducted in conjunction with any existing Federal program which is designed for the purpose of providing information on the resident or employment status of workers for employers. The study shall include an analysis of costs and benefits which shows the differences in costs and efficiency of having the Federal government or a contractor perform this service. Such comparisons should include reference to such technical capabilities as processing techniques and time, verification techniques and time, back up safeguards, and audit trail performance

(3) Such study shall also concentrate on methods of phone verification which demonstrate the best safety and service standards, the least burden for the employer, the best capability for effective enforcement, and procedures which are within the boundaries of the Privacy Act of 1974.

(4) Such study shall be conducted within 12 months of the date of enactment of this act.

(5) The Attorney General shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report—

(A) not later than six months after the date of enactment of this act, describing the status of such study; and

(B) not later than twelve months after such date, setting forth the findings of such study.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from California if he will yield for a moment.

The minority leader is present. If we cannot obtain a time agreement along the general lines I suggested, then it has to be the intent of the managers to pursue this legislation, and there would be additional rollcall votes. That is not in the form of some ghasty threat. It is the reality of the fact that we have other items coming before us—the Superfund and many other things. So if the unanimous-consent request cannot be fashioned along the conceptual lines I discussed, then I guess we will have to plow ahead—I do not know how else to say that—if we are going to proceed and get this measure completed.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have been trying to get the floor to respond to a legitimate request from the managers of the bill.

I hope we will have enough consideration for the Senators who want to leave town to let them leave. Therefore, I hope that before we go ahead with any other amendments, we might at least propound a unanimous-consent request.

As the Senator from Wyoming knows, this Senator has been waiting patiently almost all day to offer an amendment which will not take a lot of time, and I will agree to a time agreement. I would only insist on submitting appropriate remarks and put off the vote to Tuesday. I just want the opportunity to offer the amendment today and make appropriate remarks. I hope we can pursue that and help out the managers of the bill in trying to accommodate those who have to leave.

Maybe we could have one more vote or whatever it is and come back on Monday and have votes on Tuesday.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do appreciate that. That is what we are working toward. I hope to share with my colleagues the minute I have information on that. It should be forthcoming. I understand it is being prepared. Then I shall propound it and we can discuss it further.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, pursuant to that time agreement, will the Senator from Wyoming yield so I may have a brief colloquy with him.

He has just stated that there is in process right now a proposal for a time agreement. Does the time agreement include a vote this afternoon on one of the Wilson amendments that relates to seasonal workers? I have another that relates to reimbursement that we could easily deal with on Tuesday.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the Senator indicated he has an amendment. Is it Hatch-Wilson revisited?

Mr. WILSON. It is a substantial modification of the kind we had discussed this afternoon.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the matter that the Senator and I discussed was not substantial.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is not abusing the process?

Mr. SIMPSON. No, I am not, but indeed, we have protected the Senator in every instance and this Senator has been responsible for that, so I have no qualm about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I wonder if some of this colloquy could take place with the staff. I have a little amendment that is going to be accepted. I have been here 15 or 20 minutes. I would like to get it out of the way and clear the deck a little bit more.

Mr. President, the amendment I offer would require the Attorney General to conduct a study of the use of a phone verification system for determining the employment eligibility of job applications.

Such a study would analyze using existing Federal data in computers that could be accessed by the telephone to instantly verify the employment status of potential workers.

Mr. President, this study does not necessitate a workers identification card.

This study of a phone verification system would only concentrate on existing Federal data banks—that is, only numbers already in Federal computers, such as Social Security, green cards, and tax identification numbers.

My chief purpose of wanting such a study is to allow the Justice Department to carefully analyze a manner in which job applicants' employment eligibility can be verified without placing that burden on the employer. As I see it, the employer would only have to call an 800 number to be connected with the Federal computer, record the necessary identification numbers, and await the transaction code. This process is almost identical to that of a credit card verification. It would only take seconds, but would, most importantly, place the burden of verifying the worker's status on the Federal Government's data in the computer.

Mr. President, I strongly support employer sanctions. However, I am concerned about their potential effectiveness. I believe we must find a system of verifying the worker's status that is secure and efficient.

I feel strongly that we need a system that does not require the employer to be judge and jury in determining the worker's status.

And, we need a system that will establish a updated record that can be easily monitored to enforce employer sanctions.

I believe that phone verification system is such a system. But, I know some Senators have problems with such use of computers. That is why my amendment only authorizes a study. Let us let the Justice Department carefully scrutinize the worth of such a system. With a responsible study, we can then take a careful look at whether a phone verification system should be a viable part of employer sanctions.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has presented that amendment appropriately. I have had problems with the original cost of a universal telephone system. It could be quite enormous. The Department of Labor indicated $333 million a year for the first 5 years and $200 million thereafter. I think Senator CHILES has recognized this by only requesting a study.

I think the telephone call-in system may well be a very effective way of doing things. The select commission looked at it. I think it has an appropriate ring to it, I might say. To implement such a system without knowing whether it would work would be expensive. A study would clarify that.

I appreciate the Senator's thoughtful approach to it. I believe his amendment can be acceptable, and I do accept it on behalf of this manager of the bill. I believe Senator SIMON will indicate his agreement.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, yes, I can speak for Senator KENNEDY. Those of us who serve on the subcommittee think this is an excellent amendment and we shall be happy to support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 609) was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CHILES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 610

(Purpose: To require the Comptroller General of the United States to investigate ways to reduce counterfeiting of Social Security account number cards)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment on behalf of myself and Mr. D'AMATO to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] for himself and Mr. D'AMATO, proposes an amendment numbered 610:

On page 38, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(g)(1) The Comptroller General of the United States, upon consultation with the Commissioner of Immigration as well as private sector representatives (including representatives of the financial, banking, and manufacturing industries), shall inquire into technological alternatives for producing and issuing social security account number cards that are more resistant to counterfeiting than social security account number cards being issued on the date of enactment of this Act by the Social Security Administration, including the use of encoded magnetic, optical, or active electronic media such as magnetic stripes, holograms, and integrated circuit chips. Such inquiry should focus on technologies that will help ensure the authenticity of the card, rather than the identity of the bearer.

(2) The comptroller general of the United States shall explore additional actions that could be taken to reduce the potential for fraudulently obtaining and using social security account number cards.

(3) Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General of the United States shall prepare and transmit to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Finance of the Senate a report setting forth his findings and recommendations under this subsection.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in brief, in the 1983 Social Security Amendments, we required that a tamperproof, counterfeit-resistent Social Security card be produced by the Social Security Administration. They did, Mr. President, but I regret to say, and I think most Members that I have talked to agree, that what we have here is the same pasteboard card we have had for the past 50 years. An institutional bias exists in the Social Security Administration. It will not produce a Social Security card which an employer can immediately look at and have confidence in and say this is an authentic document.

The need for such a document is central to this legislation. We are imposing severe sanctions on the use of false documents for purposes of employment. The current Social Security card, easily counterfeitable, is sold in volumes on both sides of our borders. An official Government estimate is that some $15 billion a year in fraud could be involved.

Mr. President, there was a time when the Social Security card simply served the purpose of reserving an account of the individual worker in the Social Security Administration, but we are a long time past that. There was a long period during which the card actually said, "Not to be used for identification." But events have changed that, and in every area of our activities, we find the Social Security number is a convenient reference for individuals.

Persons who join the armed services today have their Social Security card as their official dog tag numbers. Students in college are given it for their bursar number. They are perfectly acceptable and perfectly confidential as long as numbers are not counterfeited and misused.

The technology of the last few years has allowed very rapid development of quite extraordinarily efficient and inexpensive devices for providing a card that can be automatically checked through telephone lines to the banks that issue credit cards. The devices are simple. They involve a magnetic tape, they involve algorithms, they involve holographs, they involve well-established technology. Your average credit card today with a holograph, with a magnetic tape, costs 8 cents apiece. This is not a large sum.

The individual worker, a young man or woman applying for a job can hand an employer a seriously responsible document, which is what a plastic or other form of card can be, with numbers and vast amounts of data that can be put on a magnetic tape on the back. Or with a holograph, if you want to make it more difficult to misrepresent.

It is the most elemental of matters and at any checkout counter in any supermarket in America, any airline counter, they simply take this card and run it through a small device and it is immediately confirmed as valid or invalid with respect to very rapidly updated information on whether the funds or the credit are still available to the card. The purpose of the proposal I have is to say, let us try to break out of past unavailing efforts and get the Social Security Administration to do this on its own. We would ask the Comptroller General, in consultation with the Immigration and Naturalization Commissioner and whomever he wishes to consult to inquire into the technological alternatives for producing and issuing Social Security account number cards that are generally resistant to counterfeit, and which by their nature can be used for a quick check as to their authenticity. This is clearly within the range of the capacity of the private sector—and should be for the Federal Government—in this most basic of insurance systems that relate directly to employment. In the overwhelming number of cases, the Social Security card will be the one bit of identification the young person of whatever age submits to an employer.

I would hope this could be adopted, and I hope that the Comptroller General will take it as a serious opportunity to put in place systems of verification—systems without which this legislation would work serious injustice on a great many young new workers and entering workers.

It is clearly within our technological ability. We only need to make the decision. We have made the decision as a society to use this number for a wide range of purposes, from military identification, as I say, to bursar number when you become a freshman at the State university. The opportunity is here and the need, I think, given the criminal penalties we are necessarily imposing in this law.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. I compliment the Senator in what he is endeavoring to do here. I have supported this effort for a long time. I think it is a major step forward.

I can recall at a time when people reacted negatively to a national identification card; calling it an invasion of their civil rights.

I think that is one of the phoniest arguments I have heard.

Anytime I want to go down and cash a check they say, "Let's see your driver's license," and I have to reach in my pocket and show them my driver's license. I do not mind that at all, except for the photograph, and I must comply.

I recall visiting with the Social Security Administrator regarding implementing a noncounterfeitable Social Security card. He said: "There is no way you can do that. The cost would be horrendous."

Then I said, "Can you explain to me why almost every State has a driver's license; if they can do that, they can make a foolproof of Social Security card!"

I go down to a little country like Costa Rica, a wonderful little democracy. Anyone who comes there votes, has a card with a photograph identifying that person; if Costa Rica is capable of doing it then so can we.

When someone says, "Show me that you are in this country legally, show me that you are a citizen of this country," I do not think it is any invasion of my privacy to pull out a Social Security card and prove it.

You know, if I am trying to support my credit with my driver's license to cash a check, then certainly when it comes to saying that "I want a job to say that I am a citizen of the United States or that I am legally in the United States," I do not understand why I should apologize for that or feel that it is any invasion of my privacy at all.

I congratulate the Senator in what he is trying to do and support him.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from Texas and reinforce the point that this is the job applicant's opportunity to prove who he is. Most any sizable employer will have a device that just electronically picks up the magnetic signal. If not the employer can go down to the nearest bank and do it or go the nearest shopping center and do it.

It does not involve any invasion of anyone's privacy. It is a document that allows you to establish your legitimacy in our social insurance system.

Mr. President, I have discussed this with our distinguished chairman and I have found him very responsive to it. I think we do accept the fact that is something to be given to the Comptroller General. The ramifications are wider than the Social Security Administration itself and besides, we have tried with the Social Security Administration and it does not work. We have a developed technology, as the Senator from Texas has said, that can work. My amendment asks that a simple study be conducted and that the Comptroller General have his report to us not later than 1 year from the day of enactment of the bill.

When the Social Security amendments were before us in 1983, we approved a provision to require the production of a new tamper-resistant Social Security card. The law, section 345 of Public Law 98-21, stated:

> The social security card shall be made of banknote paper, and (to the maximum extent practicable) shall be a card which cannot be counterfeited.

What a disappointment when late that year, the Social Security Administration began to issue the new card, and it became clear that the agency simply had not understood what Congress intended. The new card looks much like the old, a pasteboard card really much like the first ones produced by Social Security in 1936. It has the same design framing the name, nearly the same colors. It feels the same. An expert examining a card with a magnifying glass can certainly detect whether or not one of the new ones is genuine, but the average employer cannot distinguish a counterfeit card from the real article.

By so doing—or not so doing—the Social Security Administration did not succeed in protecting the integrity of the Social Security System, or American taxpayers from the massive amounts of fraud perpetrated with the help of counterfeit cards. Nor did they help the young Hispanic worker who needs a document that can quickly establish his legal status to an employer's satisfaction.

There is a history here. The Social Security Administration, from its early years, has resisted any use of the Social Security card for identification purposes. At one time, the card actually said it could not be so used.

In 1977, when I first proposed that we produce a new card, the Social Security Administration objected and the proposal was not adopted. I tried again and again, and succeeded only on the fifth try.

Or so I thought.

The use of counterfeit Social Security cards is costly. According to estimates by the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Transportation, crimes based on false identification, which frequently include counterfeit and fraudulently obtained Social Security cards, cost Americans more than $15 billion annually.

A new Social Security card—one very difficult to counterfeit and easily verified as genuine—could be manufactured at a very small cost. Today, the average high-technology-credit card with a magnetic stripe costs 8 cents to produce. A Social Security card could be designed along just these lines. The card could be highly tamper-resistant, and its authenticity could be readily discerned by the untrained eye. It must be seen as a special document; one which would be visually and tactilely more difficult to counterfeit than the current paper card.

The magnetic stripe would contain the encoded Social Security number, encoded with an algorithm known only to the Social Security Administration. A so-called watermark stripe could be placed over it, making it nearly impossible to counterfeit without technology that currently costs $10 million. The decoding algorithm could be integrated with the Social Security Administration computers.

Any employer could verify that the card was genuine with the simple hardware now used for credit cards at just about every airline and grocery checkout counter, magnetic card readers. The information is transmitted from the card to the reader, to verify if the card contains a valid coded number to be interpreted by the algorithm, and then, if necessary, the validity of that Social Security number could be verified by phone link with a central Social Security file.

Let me repeat. According to Malco, the largest manufacturer of credit cards with magnetic stripes, these cards cost 8 cents a piece, when purchased in quantities of 1 million or more. For a bit more, each card could include a hologram, which is also very difficult for counterfeiters to reproduce.

The new cards will not eliminate all fraudulent use of Social Security cards. But it will close down the shopfront operations in many border towns that flood America with false Social Security cards. And once implemented, a young worker could bring an employer a document which could be authenticated on the spot, and declare without trepidation, I am legal: I am eligible to work for you in the United States.

That is what the Congress intended in the 1983 legislation. Not a card to be authenticated solely by Immigration and Naturalization Service technicians, but a card to be sized-up by employers with relative ease and certainty.

Let's try again. Let's at least approve a study by the General accounting Office, in consultation with the Immigration and Naturalization Service and experts from business, of the technological alternatives now available to produce a more tamper-resistant Social Security card.

The study will tell us how we can produce a card that will help protect the integrity of the Social Security System, help the Naturalization and Immigration Service in its efforts to identify those living here illegally, and help the young Hispanic worker in his and her efforts to earn the living, and the dignity, to which every hardworking legal resident of this country is entitled.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do appreciate the continuing work of the Senator from New York. He and I have worked together on what to do about the integrity of the Social Security card, how to improve it and how to make it work without intrusion. As I understand the amendment, it would require technological alternatives for improving the security of the present Social Security card.

I think that is a very important question with regard to the immigration bill, particularly because so many current forms of identification are so thoroughly gimmicked. S. 1200 protects us against the specter of a national ID card. I know Senator MOYNIHAN has never felt that would be appropriate. I think that we do need to provide for the security of present documents.

This amendment is thoughtful and would allow us to study possible methods to achieve it. I am very pleased to accept the amendment. I believe it is acceptable to the minority.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr President, I would like to comment for about 5 minutes on the bill itself.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the distinguished Senator from Texas allow me to have this amendment disposed of?

Mr. BENTSEN. Of course I would. I thought it had been accepted.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Illinois wishes to indicate his acceptance.

Mr. SIMON. Thank you, Mr. President. I shall be brief.

Mr. President, on behalf of the minority on the subject we think it is an excellent amendment and are pleased to support it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I move adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment (No. 610) is agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the Chair is being insistently agreeable, and in no way would we have it otherwise. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEVIN. Will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friends.

Mr. President, I wish to engage in a brief colloquy with the chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration relative to the need for more INS inspectors at Michigan ports on the northern border.

S. 1200 includes appropriations for increased border patrol and other inspection and enforcement activities of the INS. While I am all too familiar with the serious demands and needs of the southern border, I am concerned about the shortage of inspection personnel at the northern border as well. The Port of Detroit is the largest port of entry along the northern border. Complaints to my office are constant from both the traveling public and the business community about the long lines and intolerable wait at the Detroit-Windsor Tunnel, the Ambassador Bridge, and the Blue Water Bridge between Port Huron and Sarnia. One constituent wrote to me on April 26, 1985, that she and her family were "held captive for 2½ hours" on the Ambassador Bridge. According to my constituent, during this period, "* * * cars were boiling over, clutches were smelling, and cars were being towed off * * *." The lines are so long and intolerable that fist fights have broken out in the tunnel. People have become ill while waiting and have not been able to move their cars out of the tunnel for help.

Mr. President, business in the Michigan area is being discouraged and even lost due to the cost of these lengthy waits and inconvenience at the Detroit-Canada border. Michigan's economy cannot tolerate a hardship that can so easily be avoided. I need not tell the chairman that our trade with Canada is vast and vital. It is in the interest of both our nations to restore our mutual border to the effective industrial and international link it once was. A letter I received from St. Clair County, Michigan stated:

> At its meeting of August 28, 1985, the St. Clair County Board of Commissioners entered into considerable discussion on a problem that effects both the United States and Canada. The problem is the increasing amount of time that it takes to clear Customs and/or Immigration at various points of entry and specifically at the Blue Water Bridge between Port Huron and Sarnia. As you would appreciate, any delay has an impact upon the social and economic life of both countries, but as of late, the delay is becoming more and more apparent.

The problem can easily be identified. The volume of car and truck traffic at entry points in Michigan has increased dramatically. For instance, traffic volume at the Ambassador Bridge in Detroit has increased by more than one-half million in the past decade. The increase at the Detroit/Windsor Tunnel has been greater than 300,000 for that same period. Unfortunately, full-time inspection positions have been reduced by more than 33 percent during the past 10 years.

I realize that resources are limited and that a principal goal in authorizing increased funding for inspection and enforcement activities by the INS is the problem of illegal immigration at the southern border. I hope that the northern border will not be ignored because our needs are so great.

Can the chairman give me some assurance that the ports of entry on the northern border and specifically, the Port of Detroit and the Port of Port Huron, will receive some increase in the number of inspection personnel under this legislation?

Mr. SIMPSON. The Senator from Michigan is correct in assuming that most of the additional funds authorized to be appropriated under S. 1200 for inspection personnel will be directed to the southern border, where our shortages are the greatest. However, we recognize that increases in the number of people entering ports on the northern border might well create a need for more inspectors. I will ask the INS to look at the need for more inspectors at the Port of Detroit and the Port of Port Huron and to do everything possible to meet those needs.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on another point, I wish to briefly bring to the attention of the floor manager, a case which was decided less than 3 weeks ago by a Federal district court in California. It was the case of the International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen versus Meese. In this case, the court decided that a B-1 visa is not available to indivduals who temporarily enter this country to install, service, or repair commercial or industrial equipment or machinery purchased from a company outside of the United States. The court found that INS operations instruction 214.2(b)(5) which allowed a B-1 visa to be issued under this circumstance violated sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

This INS regulation was promulgated in 1972. I would ask the floor manager if he can give me some assurance that the subcommittee will look into this issue, not to second guess the court, but to see whether this INS regulation which had been in effect for 13 years met a legitimate need which will now go unmet. Further can I have some assurance that in looking at this issue the subcommittee will consider the net impact of this INS regulation on jobs in this country held by Americans.

Mr. SIMPSON. I can understand the Senator's concern, and I assure him that the subcommittee will look into this issue with an eye to seeing whether a modification of the statute itself might be in order, taking into account the relevant employment concerns.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this is not the first time we have discussed an immigration bill. I can think back to the time when TED KENNEDY, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Mississippi, Jim Eastland, worked on an immigration bill.

I guess this is the third time I will have voted for Senator SIMPSON's bill.

I could give you probably 20 reasons not to vote for it, but none of them are good enough. I certainly do not like the idea of employer sanctions. I wish we could have come up with a better solution to it than that.

I hear some of my friends say add more border partrolmen. The people who say that, I believe have not traveled the border to the extent I have. There is no way you can put enough border patrolmen on the U.S. borders to stop people from coming into the United States.

I can take you and fly you over ranches in south Texas and I can show you paths across those ranches coming from the border and those are not paths made by cattle; those are paths made by people, moving across this country and moving into the interior of our country.

We have more illegal immigrants into this country than any other nation in the world. The estimate is 5.6 million. I do not know how that number is calculated. The very nature of the problem makes it very difficult to define but we know it is millions and millions of people and we know we have lost control of our borders.

One of the primary requirements of a country is to have integrity of its borders and we have lost that.

We have the most generous quotas on immigration of any nation in the world and it is time that we stay within those quotas.

This is the third time that Senator SIMPSON's bill has been before us. I know that there are a variety of interests opposing this bill, each of them with what they consider a legitimate concern.

But what we have to look at is the whole picture, the overall benefit immigration control provides to our Nation. One-fourth of this world goes to bed hungry every night. Another fourth suffers from malnutrition. And half of them would move here tomorrow if they could, and I wish we could handle them. We are a compassionate people and we are a concerned people. I know what is written on the Statue of Liberty, but I also know when that was written. It was at a time when the West was not settled, and we desperately needed immigrants. But that time has passed. The West is settled. We have 8.1 million people in our country who are out of work, people who are looking for jobs.

America has changed. I think it is time that we respond to those who cry out for jobs, those who want a fair shake, those who want a chance to build a home for their families. We look at a trade deficit today that is probably going to be $150 to $160 billion. Last year it was $123 billion, the year before that approximately $70 billion.

That means that we are going to have increasing loss of jobs in this country as we make transitions to other types of occupations. This is no time for a great influx of immigrants to come to this country.

I hope that at this time we will once more pass this bill by an overwhelming majority and that that message will go forth to the House of Representatives and that you will see the same kind of reaction there, and once again we will restore the integrity of the borders of this country.

I congratulate my good friends, Senator SIMPSON and Senator KENNEDY, for the monumental work that they have done on this piece on legislation. I hope that the Members and my colleagues will support it and support it in great numbers.

AMENDMENT NO. 611

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate regarding ethanol imports)

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk in behalf of myself, Mr, SIMON, Mr. BUMPERS, and Mr. HARKIN, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], for himself, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BUMPERS, and Mr. HARKIN proposes an amendment numbered 611.

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) The Treasury Department's decision on August 28, 1985 to postpone until November 1, 1985 implementation of a 60-cent-per-gallon tariff on imported Brazilian ethanol would cause significant harm to U.S. agricultural and commercial ethanol industries, a loss of jobs in the ethanol and related industries, further deteriorate the U.S. balance of trade, pressure downward commodity prices even further and heighten the long-term threat of more U.S. dependence on imported oil;

(2) This decision clearly is counter to the explicit dictates of the Congress in the passage of Public Law 96-499 adopted by the Congress in 1980 and signed into law by the President;

(3) The potential amount of ethanol which could be imported under reduced tariffs before November 1, 1985 could equal the total amount of annual domestic ethanol production in the United States;

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Senate that—

(1) The 60-cent per gallon tariff on imported ethanol should be immediately implemented.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. Yes, without interrupting this part of the proceedings.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I merely want to ask our good friend, the manager of the bill, Mr. SIMPSON, whether or not we could give our Senators word that there will be no more rollcall votes today. I do not have to leave. Some of our Members on both sides of the aisle have flights out of Washington and, as I understand it, if they do not get away within the next few minutes to make those flights, they will have to stay overnight and will not be able to leave today.

The distinguished Senator knows that I support his bill. I am not one of those who has to leave in this instance.

If we could have that agreement that there will be no more rollcall votes today, we could continue to work on an agreement looking toward Tuesday for final passage. I cannot assure that we will have an agreement, but I cannot assure we can have an agreement if we continue to have rollcalls.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am fully aware, not only in my capacity as manager of the bill, but as a Member of the leadership on this side, that it is hazardous business to become known as an unaccommodating chap. I really am not. I really would love to tell my colleagues right now to head for National Airport and Dulles. I cannot.

But that is not me delaying them. I am ready to stay here and process this bill and process the amendments to this bill, either tonight until 9 o'clock or whatever you have in mind, or all day Monday.

But I know one thing about legislating in this place after 6½ years. Once I make that decision, this Chamber will clear and we will be back in stringing this bill out on Tuesday and Wednesday and Thursday, and that is the way it will be. I am not going to be a part of that. I hate to be hardnosed, as they say in the game, but we are just going to keep processing. If people wish to filibuster or intrude or interfere, I guess we will just keep going, because I do not know any other way. And I will probably be looking forward to the expertise of the minority leader if he has any thoughts to help in the expedition of that process.

What I want to do is this: So there will be no mystery, no mystery at all, let me just share it with you once more. It would be a unanimous-consent agreement to process every amendment that is before us and allow people to leave these Chambers tonight. As soon as this unanimous consent is agreed to, Members may absent themselves and we will then deal—either this evening, or at the accommodation of the amendment proposers—with several amendments and I have them listed here. There is a Metzenbaum amendment, two Simon amendments, a Levin amendment, a Wilson amendment, which is a revisitation of the amendment of yesterday with a "substantial change"; another Wilson amendment; a D'Amato amendment which will be agreed to, perhaps; a Cranston amendment with a distribution formula; a Heinz amendment dealing with Social Security, an Exon amendment dealing with Brazilian ethanol imports; a Bumpers amendment, either perfecting or a substitute to the Heinz amendment; and a Simpson amendment which could be called the all-gunner amendment of some kind.

I then would have asked unanimous consent that any rollcall votes ordered past the hour of 6 this evening or on Monday, September 16 all day, or in relation to any amendments on S. 1200 be postponed to occur in the morning of Tuesday, September 17.

Originally that was proposed for 10 a.m. Senator KENNEDY and I have a refugee consultation at 10 a.m. on Tuesday. Since there is not a time agreement yet, I would propose that that would be at 12 noon, then, on Tuesday, the 17th, in the order in which the yeas and nays were ordered.

I would also have asked unanimous consent that there be 5 minutes of debate prior to each sequenced vote on Tuesday, to be equally divided, and that there would be no motion to recommit and that final passage would occur on S. 1200 without intervening action, other than third reading, immediately following the last sequenced rollcall vote on Tuesday, September 17, and that paragraph 4 of rule XII be waived.

I present that. If that is not acceptable, we will plow ahead with all of the hazards that go with that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the agreement has not been cleared on either side, to my knowledge. I have not seen it yet.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska still have the floor? I am happy to yield to the managers of the bill for anything that they want to do.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, then, at this point, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. EXON. I did not yield for that purpose.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me review, since we are talking again here about order. I submit to the Senator from Nebraska that his amendment that he is speaking on now was presented last evening. Then I put him on the list. The list is one that has other people to appear before the Senator from Nebraska: Senator METZENBAUM with an amendment, Senator WILSON with an amendment, Senator SIMON with an amendment, Senator LEVIN with an amendment, Senator METZENBAUM, Senator D'AMATO, and then Senator EXON.

I am only saying that if now we are to proceed with the amendment of Senator EXON—and apparently we are; he presented it—I simply submit that I would be very pleased to accommodate the Senator if I could, but an amendment on the issue of Brazilian ethanol imports is not something I am familiar with in connection with immigration reform. I have read it. The Senator presented it to me. He was very good to present it to me this morning. It is not now out of order procedurally for him to do as he has done. It is perfectly appropriate. But it is certainly not part of the proposal, as people have been waiting in line very patiently on both sides of the aisle to deal with their particular issues.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I hope that the remarks that we are making on this subject and the preceding discussion will not fall within the printing of the RECORD so as to interrupt the introduction of the amendment that I have accomplished a few moments ago.

I was a little bit surprised at the remarks being made by the manager of the bill. I think the manager of the bill should know that, with the possible exception of the Senator from Wyoming, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I believe this Senator has been on the floor more today than any other Member of this body. I suggest that I have been patiently waiting.

I was somewhat disturbed, frankly, when the manager of the bill did not object to the Senator from Pennsylvania standing up and offering an amendment that was out of order. The reason that I stood up, Mr. President, a few moments ago was that, after the Senator from Texas finished his discussion, there was no one on the floor that I could see, no one in their seats, no one standing, and we were wasting time once again. So I thought: What is wrong with the Senator from Nebraska proceeding with the introduction of his amendment?

I have the floor. I am going to do that, despite what might be the objections, legitimate or otherwise, of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. President, in 1980 the Congress, in an effort to promote a U.S. ethanol industry and in the interest of long-term energy security, set the import duty on fuel alcohol at roughly 60 cents per gallon. It was a responsible course of action to take. This measure was intended to lead us toward energy self-sufficiency and would provide new markets for our agricultural commodities.

However, in 1984, American importers soon began to capitalize on a loophole of their invention which would allow imported ethanol to be mixed with a small amount of toluene to avoid the U.S. tariff. The phony and devious theory was that a small amount of the chemical toluene added to ethanol made ethanol something other than ethanol, even though the new brew was employed for identical purposes.

On August 2 of this year our Customs Service belatedly closed this loophole and it appeared that this flood of foreign ethanol would be held back at last.

However, the Treasury Department began to intervene on the part of importers. As a compromise, the Customs Service and the Treasury Department agreed to a 90-day grace period before implementing the congressionally mandated tariff for this incoming ethanol until November 1.

Mr. President, a compromise and a sell-out of great proportions occurred. The Treasury Department compromised our integrity. The Treasury Department circumvented the will of Congress. The Treasury Department decided it knew what was best, regardless of the plans this body set out for our own energy independence and the marketing of our own agricultural products.

Exactly 2 years ago, I assisted with the groundbreaking ceremony of Nebraska's first major ethanol production facility in Hastings, NE. At that time all felt an enormous sense of accomplishment. Through the course of my Governorship in Nebraska, and with the help of the Congress, we had overcome obstacle after obstacle in our effort to provide a measure of energy self-sufficiency for America and new markets for American agricultural products.

Today, in light of recent developments, our ambition for developing ethanol is holding steady, but my optimism is challenged.

Ethanol production in the United States is being challenged on several fronts. What continues to amaze me is that challenges to domestic, commercial production of ethanol come not from technical problems or environmental concerns, but from our very own Government.

Recently I communicated my frustration on this matter to the President's Trade Representative, Mr. Clayton Yeutter. In my telegram to Mr. Yeutter I said:

> • • • It is evident that the Reagan administration cares more about the financial health of American international bankers and their insolvent foreign loans than the imminent bankruptcy of thousands of farmers, ranchers, and middlewestern small businessmen • • •.

I asked the Trade Representative to intervene in this matter and help implement the higher tariff immediately.

This tariff delay has severely harmed American ethanol producers. And it has, without a doubt, added insult to injury to America's farmers who face economic problems greater than any they have faced since the Great Depression.

Not only will this horde of Brazilian ethanol at minimal tariff cripple domestic ethanol production—this imported ethanol is actually fueling the steamroller of economic depression which is already crushing farms and small towns on its way to our larger metropolitan areas. These cheap, subsidized imports during this 90 day period could equal 1 whole year's worth of U.S. ethanol production.

With a wink and a nudge, the Treasury Department will allow up to 600 million gallons of ethanol to come into the U.S. almost duty free. This is the equivalent of 240 million bushels of corn and could depress corn prices by 15 cents per bushel.

Not only does this action devastate our domestic ethanol industry, but it will play a major role in our 1985 farm program. It could mean that the Commodity Credit Corporation would incur an additional obligation of perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars in corn loans, not to mention the 30 cents per bushel per year for storage and 25 cents per bushel per year for interest. Furthermore, deficiency payments will increase.

Our great Nation also loses in another, more direct way. Up to $350 milion in import duties will be lost.

The delay in reinstating the tariff is purely, unmistakably, and blatantly a windfall for a limited number of ethanol importers. It should be obvious that this windfall is not going to those who are interested in ethanol as a source of renewable fuels, nor is it going to people who are concerned about utilizing our farm products.

Mr. President, just the other day Vice President Bush declared that the President will get tough with our trading partners. He said, "No more Mr. Nice Guy". Well, here is a place where we can start.

It appears that the centerpiece of the President's forthcoming new trade policy will be aggressive enforcement of existing trade laws. That is exactly what I am asking for in this sense of the Senate resolution. The resolution does not recommend a new trade law. It simply says that the existing 60-cent-per-gallon tariff on imported ethanol should be immediately implemented.

I regret that this resolution has to be placed on this bill. However, we are already halfway through the 90-day grace period allowed by the Treasury Department ruling and that ruling must be reversed now.

It is tough enough to fashion sensible agricultural and energy policies for America without having to fight our Government. We must take a stand today for America's farmer and for energy sufficiency.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. President, I will be very happy to set over the vote on this until next Tuesday. I am about to ask for a rollcall vote. I want to fully cooperate with the manager of this bill, as I have, to get our colleagues released, those who wish to be released. That is why I have been patient all day long. That is why I took exception to the indication that when the Senator from Nebraska got up under the rightful Rules of the Senate, when no one else sought recognition, the indication was that I should have waited for somebody who was not here to present their amendment. I did not choose to do that.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, one of the cosponsors desires recognition but I do not have the right to yield to him unless it is for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. EXON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Is it not true as you were going about Nebraska and I was going about Illinois and my colleague, Senator DIXON was going about Illinois, that we found farmers in desperate straits and the last thing we need is the lowering of corn prices by ethanol from Brazil? Is that not correct?

Mr. EXON. The Senator from Illinois is so accurately correct.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I commend him for his amendment.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I share the frustration expressed by my distinguished colleague from Nebraska, Mr. EXON, about the current Federal policy as it applied to imported ethanol. This is another glaring example of how our current trade policies work against the American farmer.

I regret that the U.S. Treasury Department seems to be more concerned about the well-being of Brazilian agricultural interests than they are about the American farmer and rural America.

I commend Senator EXON for his continued efforts to assist with this issue and I urge my colleagues to join in this effort to place the Treasury Department on notice that we will not allow these types of stupid policies to continue. They are disastrous for America and for the American farmer.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I want to express to the Senator from Nebraska an apology. He has been patient. Indeed, there was no activity on the floor when he determined to take that opportunity to present an amendment which he had been waiting to present for a day—a full day. I do extend that apology to him and thank him for his understanding.

Mr. EXON. If the Senator will yield, I thank him. An apology is not in order. I know the extreme patience that the Senator from Wyoming has. I appreciate his consideration. I just wanted to state my remarks for the record.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Let me just state that with regard specifically to the amendment, the finding here is not binding, although it might be considered, I understand, very significant in the litigation. The issue appears to be a very significant one. I think it deserves full consideration through the normal committee proceedings, a hearing and debate by those most deeply involved in it, those on the Agriculture Committee. I appreciate the offer of the Senator from Nebraska to consider that if we are able to stack votes and come to a Tuesday vote. I assure the Senator we will have a vote on the amendment. I will advise the Senator from Nebraska I will move to table the amendment, not to have an up-or-down vote but to table if we are able to take it to the Tuesday stacked votes. That may break down.

Mr. EXON. I would like a little bit of clarification. I had previously talked with the Senator from Wyoming. I discussed this with the Senator from Kansas, the majority leader, who supports it, because what we are doing in this sense-of-the-Senate resolution that I have sent to the desk is essentially the same request that the majority leader, Senator DOLE, and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator LUGAR, made to the Secretary of the Treasury within the last few days.

I am quite surprised that the Senator would move to table. I assumed there was general agreement on this.

I am certainly not objecting to the Senator's right to move to table, if that is what he wants to do.

We agree, do we not, that the vote will be held on Tuesday? I would rather vote this afternoon, if possible, but I suspect the Senator would rather do it on Tuesday to accommodate other Members, which the Senator and I have been trying to do all day.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will this issue still be topical in several weeks?

Mr. EXON. I would respond to that, with all due respect, it would not be. November 1 is the key date. As I said in my remarks, and perhaps the Senator from Wyoming was momentarily distracted, we are halfway through the grace period authorized by the Treasury Department, and each and every day that goes by without a clear and overwhelming expression from the Senate that something should be done is what makes it timely. We do not have the time to refer it to committee.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, under those circumstances, and if we are able to pass this bill and go to conference, this would not be a topical issue. Under those circumstances, since it is an expression the Senator wants to make and a clear one, I am willing to accept the sense-of-the-Senate resolution with regard to this particular matter. However, I must clear that with the minority.

Mr. EXON. It has already been cleared on this side.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then it is so accepted.

Mr. EXON. We seem to be in agreement. The yeas and nays have been ordered. Will we stack the yea and nay votes until Tuesday next?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator will take it without a rollcall vote. Is that right?

Mr. EXON. I requested and would like a rollcall vote. In order to accommodate as many Members as possible, I think it would better to put that off until Tuesday. But I am prepared to vote, if that is the will of the leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I indicate to the Senator from Nebraska that a rollcall vote is certainly his prerogative, and I would not move to table and I ask if he will agree to deal with that on Tuesday. If we are able to reach the accommodation to stack votes, it will be handled at that time. If not, of course, he will be protected with a rollcall vote at the time we are voting again.

Mr. EXON. I have no objection whatsoever. That is what I have been indicating to the leader all day long. I want a rollcall vote; it has been ordered; it is at the desk. We can have a rollcall vote now or Tuesday. We can stack it. We can do anything we want with it. I am trying to accommodate completely the leaders and the other Members of the body.

I understood the Senator to say that if we can get the stacking of votes on Tuesday, which he does not have yet, we would vote on it on Tuesday. Otherwise, if we plow ahead, as the leader of the bill might unfortunately be forced to do because he could not get the time agreement, I would anticipate that we would vote on it sometime this evening or on Tuesday, either of which is acceptable to this Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator.

AMENDMENT NO. 612

(Purpose: To improve housing for temporary agricultural workers)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I call up an amendment which is at the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds the Senator from Ohio that the other amendment is still pending.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska be temporarily laid aside until that matter is resolved and that I be permitted to call up an amendment at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I call up an amendment which is at the desk, having to do with the subject of housing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 612:

On page 44, line 19, insert "for a period of not to exceed two years from the date of enactment of this Act" after "permitted".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this amendment restores the principle that growers who use temporary foreign workers must provide those foreign workers with housing.

Under the current law, growers are required to do this, and it has not proved to be a major burden; but the bill changes the current standard by allowing housing allowance instead. That creates a number of problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my further remarks in connection with this matter be permitted before the conclusion of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be set-aside and that it be dealt with on Tuesday, with or without a rollcall vote, depending upon whether or not the matter can be resolved with the managers of the bill; that if we cannot resolve it, the rollcall vote occur at such time as the rollcall votes occur on Tuesday, or such later time when other amendments dealing with this amendment are to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rollcall vote has not been called for, but, without objection, the request is granted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, this matter of the growers has been a continuing discussion.

I understand that the amendment is to sunset, after 2 years, the provision permitting employers to provide a housing allowance, rather than housing, provided there is housing available in the area. I must say that I think that is too short a time. I think migrant labor housing in sufficient quantity is not presently available. It is certainly a heavy issue.

We provided in the bill for housing allowances, which would allow growers to pay an allowance so that the workers could rent quarters in town or wherever. The special temporary worker housing is preferable, but it does not exist in adequate amounts at the present time.

I see my two colleagues who are vitally concerned about the migrant temporary worker issue. It will take time to build that kind of housing. I agree with the Senator; I think it is necessary.

There are zoning problems in connection with housing. One of the most vexing public jobs I have held was with the planning and zoning commission.

Two years seems an insufficient amount of time. If the Senator from Ohio would increase the time limit to more appropriate years, I would certainly accept the amendment. Two years is not enough.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I point out to my distinguished colleague from Wyoming that at the present time the housing is required. The bill before us eliminates the housing and provides for housing allowances.

I think there is some merit to what the Senator is saying, that if you are going to build housing, it cannot be done overnight. That is the reason why I set the 2-year period. It is my view that it is an adequate time.

However, since I have already indicated that I am prepared to have this matter be set for a vote on Tuesday, I hope that, although I will not be here on Monday, sometime Tuesday morning he and I may be able to get together and resolve this matter on an amicable basis. I am presently prepared to tell him that I am willing to concede and go up as far as 2 years and 2 weeks, but we might go a little further than that if he twisted my arm.

Mr. SIMPSON. We might try 6 years and 2 weeks and see where we can go.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the bill changes the longstanding requirement that employers must provide housing to temporary foreign workers. This drastic weakening of the current requirement will not result in decent safe housing for foreign workers. The result will be quite the opposite.

First, there is no assurance that the allowance will be adequate. The bill requires only a reasonable allowance. What is reasonable? At the very least, there will be major problems in administering this vague standard and in enforcing compliance.

Second, it is totally unrealistic to assume that decent housing will be available in many rural areas where these workers will be employed. The bill provides that an allowance is permitted only if suitable housing is available in the proximate area of employment, Again, this language creates a vague, unenforceable standard. How far does the worker have to travel?

Finally, we have no assurance that the worker will use the allowance for housing—perhaps he or she will need it for food or medicial care. They may decide to sleep in the fields rather than take the time to find housing, travel to it and spend the allowance.

The result of all those factors is certain to be workers sleeping in ditches and plastic bags.

Why are we abandoning—in 1985—worker protections that have been in existence for many years? We should be going forward not backward in our concern about the working conditions of a group that has been historically exploited.

As I will explain further, this amendment does not reinstate the housing requirement immediately. Since the H-2 Program will be expanded to some extent, it creates a 2-year delay to allow a realistic period for growers to develop housing to meet the requirement.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator from California addressing himself to this issue?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to confirm what the distinguished manager of the bill has stated. There are a number of States that do require housing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has not been recognized.

Mr. WILSON. I thought the Chair had recognized me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, there are several States, typically those with the greatest experience in the use of seasonal workers, which have provided for housing. This subject is addressed in the amendment that we are going to propose. It was addressed in the amendment that was the subject of such discussion.

I say to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from Wyoming is correct. There are other States which would be required, under the amendment that is to be proposed, to provide housing or a housing allowance, and that was done explicitly with the fact of life in mind that there are some which will have to make provisions.

So I simply observe that the Senator from Wyoming is correct in stating the case.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I just want to respond very briefly to my friend from California and point out that a housing allowance does not really solve the problem for a migrant worker. There are not that many Hilton Hotels or Sheraton Hotels or even Days Inns that are located in the rural areas where the migrant workers can use the housing allowance. I am afraid that what will happen is that he or she will get the housing allowance and will wind up sleeping in the ditch.

Before I say I am willing to strike that, I shall say that the law does not now provide for any housing allowance. It does have a requirement that housing be provided so that the legislation we had before—so that if we do not pass any legislation, then the housing has to be provided since this bill eliminates any provision for the housing and permits the housing allowance.

I think providing an extremely long time to provide that housing is totally unreasonable but, since the Senator from Iowa is such a reasonable person, perhaps between now and Tuesday, we can work out some compromise period closer to the 2-year period I have suggested. If the Senator from California and the Senator from Wyoming are their usual reasonable selves, perhaps we can work this matter out.

Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Wyoming that I had asked unanimous consent to set this matter over until Tuesday. I do not think there is anything further on it that I have to state, unless he does. It seems to me we are now back on the Exon amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, based on the conversation we just had with the distinguished minority leader and the manager of the bill on our side, I think it is safe to assume that there will be no more votes this evening. We will have to work out an order for rollcall votes beginning at 10 a.m. on Tuesday. We will try that on Monday.

I understand that those who have offered amendments are prepared to vote now. But there will be no more votes today.

So we will go over until noon on Monday, and after the special orders this will be the pending business.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader and the minority leader.

My colleagues have been very patient, and I appreciate that.

I say to the majority leader that with respect to Members who have amendments pending, we will arrange with their staffs to have the issues presented on Monday or Tuesday, at the mutual convenience of the parties.

We hope to arrive at some type of unanimous-consent agreement on Monday by which we would go to a time certain for a vote on Tuesday, and that is what we will strive for. But we will process the amendments on Monday and Tuesday, and the proponents of the amendments have indicated their willingness to do that.

We hope to extricate the Social Security amendment from the action, and that is a necessary thing.

That is a necessary thing. It is the thing that has delayed the progress. I assure those listening that I appreciate their patience and I hope we did not cause too much inconvenience to them on Friday afternoon. To all of those who have been inconvenienced on both sides of the aisle, I regret that.

AMENDMENT NO. 617

(Purpose: Technical amendment)

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I have a technical amendment to require that the majority leader and the minority leader of the U.S. Senate be consulted by the President pro tempore before he appoints or nominates persons to be appointed members to the Commission on Temporary Agricultural Worker Programs and the Legalization Commission.

I submit that amendment and ask for its consideration.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

Mr. President, I remove my reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] proposes an amendment numbered 617:

Technical amendment: "To require that the majority leader and the minority leader of the U.S. Senate be consulted by the President pro tempore before he appoints or nominates persons to be appointed members of the Commission on Temporary Agricultural Worker Programs and the Legalization Commission."

1. On p. 62, line 11, after "Senate", insert: "after consultation with the majority leader and the minority leader of the Senate".

2. On p. 69, line 3, after "Senate", insert: "after consultation with the majority leader and the minority leader of the Senate".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after a review of S. 1200 and the intent of the two commissions, I am advised that that is really not a requirement at this time. I shall withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 618

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS] for himself, Mr. GOLDWATER, and Mr. TRIBLE, proposes an amendment numbered 618:

At the appropriate place, insert: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law or of this Act, no agency or instrument of the United States, or any corporation or other entity created by act of Congress shall extend any loan or other form of credit of whatever nature to any government or agency thereof, of any country in North America which allows access to its ports to any nuclear weapons delivery-capable Soviet naval vessel (except vessels in extremis) at any time after September 20, 1985."

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, the amendment is self-explanatory. I might say that it is cosponsored by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, Mr. GOLD-

WATER, and the distinguished occupant of the Chair, Mr. TRIBLE, and myself.

The purpose of the amendment is to address the growing problem within Mexico and Central America of Soviet intervention. I know that the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has worked long and hard on immigration legislation. I just had a discussion with one of the most respected Members of the Senate, Senator LONG of Louisiana, about the importance in the view of many Senators here of immigration legislation.

The significance of the amendment that is now pending before the Senate is that if, in fact, the Soviets continue their reckless expansion, as they have done ever since the end of World War II, of their sphere of influence and their orbit, no matter what kind of legislation this body passes, we are going to have a tremendous influx of more than immigrants but refugees who will be seeking political asylum from our good friends and neighbors south of the border.

I think the amendment significant when one reads in the press today that our friends in Mexico have invited a Soviet naval squadron to make a port call in Vera Cruz on October 4. I only say to my colleagues if an amendment of this nature is not acted on by the Congress and the U.S. Government does not take a firm stand on where we are with respect to our policy in our own hemisphere, in 1, 2, 3, or 4 years from now, it will be far too late because there will be a permanent Soviet squadron in Vera Cruz and it will be too late to act on an amendment such as this. So I offer this amendment.

I know the distinguished majority leader has said there can be no record votes on this amendment, but it is the intention of the author of this amendment to seek a record vote to the amendment on Tuesday. So I say to the manager of the bill that I would be willing to have this amendment set aside as pending business if the floor manager wants to act on the bill.

It is my intention that we should vote on this before this legislation is passed. It is totally, in my opinion, consistent with the efforts of the Senator from Wyoming to gain control of our borders, because without recognition of the international implications of Soviet expansionism into the Western Hemisphere, no immigration reform legislation is going to be able to stop the flood of refugees and immigrants that will come into this country.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, when they associated my name with that, I just trembled and went to pieces there. That is a provocative amendment. It certainly is. I am not a cosponsor of that amendment, I can assure you.

However, I am being humorous. That is my sword and my shield. The Senator from Idaho is quite serious. I know him. And the cosponsors are quite serious.

It would be very regrettable for me to deal with that issue on immigration reform. That would be something I could not do under any circumstances. But it is a very provocative issue. It is the pending business. Without going any further on that, we shall deal with it on Monday.

At this point, I indicate that we have failed to come up with a unanimous consent agreement. We have indicated that to the Members on both sides of the aisle.

We will proceed with the amendment process on Monday as we come in at noon, and we have already arranged for times. The proponents are ready and the managers will be ready to proceed at that time.

AMENDMENT NO. 599

(Purpose: To express the sense of Congress that the English language is the official language of the United States)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment to the immigration bill expressing the sense of the Senate that the English language be the official language of the United States. I wish to take a moment to state why.

My distinguished colleague from Idaho has highlighted some legitimate concerns. It is important that all Americans learn to speak English in order to take full advantage of all the benefits that this country has to offer. No one knows that better than I. My father came to this country as a young man. He never learned to write English because he was 14 when he arrived in Albuquerque, NM, from Italy. He came here to work in a grocery store owned by his uncle. The luxury of not working was never available to him. My father realized that he was at a disadvantage because of that fact, and that is why my father and mother were adamant that I go to school and stay in school and learn English. And I thank them every day of my life for that.

But this amendment won't remedy any of the problems which the Senator from Idaho has pointed out. It won't help anyone learn the English language. It won't improve our society. It won't lead to a more cohesive nation. In fact, it will create a more divided nation. This amendment is an insult to all Americans for whom English is not the first language now at this stage of their life and to all those Americans who would like to learn English but who can't for one reason or another.

You know, I come from a pretty unique State. New Mexico is a land where the Indians, the Hispanics, and the European settlers have come together to create a tricultural society. It's a State where nobody is in the majority, everybody is a minority. So we New Mexicans have had to learn to live together in harmony. It was not always easy, but we did it. We created something special out there through respect and understanding of our differences and by concentrating on our similarities. This amendment will only upset that delicate balance; it concentrates on our differences and ignores our similarities as people.

Do not forget that long before the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock, Spanish was being spoken in New Mexico. The same is true of California, Florida, and Texas. And we don't know how long the Native American languages have been echoing through the mesas of New Mexico and the rest of this land. Far longer than the speakers of English have been here, that's for sure. Let us not insult the proud heritages of these people by assuming a position of linguistic superiority.

I oppose this amendment because it does nothing that it is supposed to do. It won't help a poor Italian grocer to learn how to write English. It won't help a Spanish-speaking person to learn how to speak English. It won't create a better, stronger, more cohesive American society. It will only insult those for whom a language other than English is a major part of their culture and their lives.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to adopt any of the following joint resolutions: Calendar Order No. 288, Senate Joint Resolution 68; Calendar Order No. 289, Senate Joint Resolution 139; Calendar Order No. 290, Senate Joint Resolution 141; Calendar Order No. 293, Senate Joint Resolution 173; and Calendar Order No. 294, Senate Joint Resolution 186.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection to the items enumerated.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calendar items just identified en bloc and agreed en bloc and all preambles be considered and agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they are considered en bloc and agreed to en bloc.

WILLIAM BEAUMONT DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 68) to designate November 21, 1985, as "William Beaumont Day," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 68

Whereas November 21, 1985 marks the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of William Beaumont;

Whereas Dr. Beaumont was a pioneer in American physiology through his study of the human digestive process;

Whereas Dr. Beaumont typified the prepared mind, the patient observer, and the brilliant investigator, who significantly expanded the peripheries of knowledge;

Whereas Dr. Beaumont embodies the zest for knowledge and devotion to reason which characterized the Nation during his lifetime;

Whereas physicians, scientists and researchers of associations, including the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology, the American Academy of Occupational Medicine, and the Association of Military Surgeons, continue in Beaumont's tradition and claim him as the founding father of such organizations;

Whereas several States honor his memory, including Connecticut, where he was born; Vermont, where he was licensed; Michigan, where he conducted his pioneering research; New York, where he practiced medicine and conducted research; and Missouri, where he built a thriving medical practice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That November 21, 1985 is designated as "William Beaumont Day" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

NATIONAL HOME CARE WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 139) to designate the week of December 1, 1985, through December 7, 1985, as "National Home Care Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 139

Whereas organized home health care services to the elderly and disabled have existed in this country since the last quarter of the eighteenth century;

Whereas home health care, including skilled nursing services, physical therapy, speech therapy, social services, occupational therapy, health counseling and education, and home-maker-home health aide services, is recognized as an effective and economical alternative to unnecessary institutionalization;

Whereas caring for the ill and disabled in their homes places emphasis on the dignity and independence of the individual receiving such services;

Whereas the Federal Government has supported home health services since the enactment of the medicare program, with the number of home health agencies providing services increasing from less than five hundred to more than five thousand; and

Whereas many private, public and charitable organizations provide these and similar services to millions of patients each year preventing, postponing, and limiting the need for institutionalization and enabling such patients to remain independent: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of December 1, 1985 through December 7, 1985, is designated as "National Home Care Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

NATIONAL TOURISM WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 141) to designate the week beginning on May 18, 1986, as "National Tourism Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 141

Whereas tourism is vital to the United States, contributing to economic prosperity, employment, and international balance of payments;

Whereas travelers from the United States and other countries spent $210,000,000,000 in the United States during 1983, directly producing four million, six hundred thousand jobs, $45,800,000,000 in wages and salaries, and over $25,000,000,000 in Federal, State, and local tax revenues;

Whereas, if viewed as a single retail industry, the travel and tourism sector of the economy constituted the second largest retail industry in the United States in 1983 as measured by business receipts;

Whereas tourism contributes substantially to personal growth, education, and intercultural appreciation of geography, history, and people of the United States;

Whereas tourism enhances international understanding and good will; and

Whereas, as people throughout the world become aware of the outstanding cultural and recreational resources available across the United States, travel and tourism will become an increasingly important aspect of the daily lives of the people of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning May 18, 1986, is hereby designated as "National Tourism Week," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

NATIONAL SEWING MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 173), to designate the month of September 1985 as "National Sewing Month," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 173

Whereas the sewing industry annually honors the approximately fifty million people who sew at home and the approximately forty million people who sew at least part of their wardrobe;

Whereas the home sewing industry generates over $3,500,000,000 annually for the economy of the United States; and

Whereas innumerable careers in fashion, retail merchandising design, patternmaking, and textiles have had their genesis in the home and in elementary school home economics classes; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of September 1985 is designated "National Sewing Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

NATIONAL HISTORICALLY BLACK COLLEGES WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 186) to designate the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, as "National Historically Black Colleges Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 186

Whereas there are one hundred and two historically black colleges and universities in the United States;

Whereas such colleges and universities provide the quality education so essential to full participation in a complex, highly technological society;

Whereas black colleges and universities have a rich heritage and have played a prominent role in American history;

Whereas such institutions have allowed many underprivileged students to attain their full potential through higher education; and

Whereas the achievements and goals of historically black colleges are deserving of national recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, is designated as "National Historically Black Colleges Week" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States and interested groups to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs, thereby demonstrating support for historically black colleges and universities in the United States.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Vice Adm. James A. Lyons, Jr.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NAVY

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Vice Adm. James A. Lyons, Jr., to be admiral.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination just identified be confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, let the RECORD show there is no objection from this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONDEMNING THE KIDNAPING OF PRESIDENT DUARTE'S DAUGHTER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I call up the resolution which is at the desk which was submitted by Senator KENNEDY, Senator LUGAR, Senator BIDEN, Senator PELL, and Senator BOREN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 219) condemning the kidnaping of President Duarte's daughter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am sure that all Senators as well as all Americans were stunned to learn that President Duarte's daughter had been assaulted and kidnaped. This is an act of terrorism, pure and simple, and it shocks the conscience of civilized peoples throughout the world.

On an issue like this, all Americans are united. Our thoughts are with President Duarte and with the other members of his family—as are our prayers. And whether this is the act of common criminals or of political extremists, it is an outrage.

We join together today to express our anger, to extend our sympathies to President Duarte and his family, and to urge President Reagan to offer whatever assistance may be requested by the Government of El Salvador to locate Ines Guadelupe Duarte Duran, to secure her safe release, and to bring her kidnappers to speedy justice.

Let us pray that Ms. Duarte Duran will soon be released and allowed to return to her family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 219) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. Res. 219

Resolved,

Whereas the oldest daughter of President Jose Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador, Mrs. Ines Guadelupe Duarte Duran, was assaulted and kidnapped yesterday in her home city of San Salvador;

Whereas the people responsible for the kidnapping are armed terrorists, in the course of the kidnapping, killed a driver and wounded a bodyguard; and

Whereas such acts of terrorism against innocent civilians deserve the condemnation of all civilized peoples throughout the world;

It is the sense of the Senate that:

The kidnapping of President Duarte's daughter is to be deplored in the strongest possible terms;

The individuals responsible for this unconscionable and unwarranted act of terrorism are to be condemned;

The sympathy and prayers of the American people are with the Duarte family and with the people of El Salvador during this ordeal; and

The individuals responsible for this crime should release Ines Guadelupe Duarte Duran immediately and safely.

The President of the United States should provide whatever assistance the government of El Salvador or the Duarte family may request to achieve the safe return of Mrs. Duarte Duran and to bring the kidnappers to justice;

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 1:36 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 444) to amend the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act.

The message also announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 61. A concurrent resolution to commend Pete Rose on becoming the all-time Major League leader in base hits.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, September 13, 1985, she had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled joint resolution:

S.J. Res. 31. Joint resolution to designate the week of November 24 through November 30, 1985, and the week of November 23 through November 29, 1986, as "National Family Week."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-374. A resolution adopted by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Armed Services.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the shipbuilding industry in Massachusetts is part of both the past and present history of the Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, the General Dynamics Quincy Shipyard recently observed its 100th year of operation and credits among its accomplishments more than 350 ships of all classes and types for the Navy; and

"Whereas, the extraordinary production records achieved during two world wars and thereafter include such proud naval vessels as the U.S.S. Lexington I and II, the Wasp, the Massachusetts, the Nevada, the North Dakota, the Quincy, the Boston, the Des Moines, the San Diego, the Northampton, and the nuclear-powered ships Bainbridge and Long Beach; and

"Whereas, many of these ships distinguished themselves at Pearl Harbor, Guadalcanal, Iwo Jima, Okinawa, the battles of the Coral Sea, Philippine Sea and Leyte Gulf; and

"Whereas, the last major Navy contract awarded to the Quincy yard is in the process of being completed and no new ship construction contracts have been awarded; and

"Whereas, major layoffs began in May of 1985 from a workforce of 6,200 skilled and unskilled workers; and

"Whereas, the addition of these workers to the ranks of the unemployed will add an undue hardship to their families, to the economy of the South Shore and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts House of Representatives strongly supports the International Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, locals 5, 90, and 151 and management officials of General Dynamics to secure naval contracts for the Quincy yard and requests the Secretary of the Navy and the Massachusetts congressional delegation to recognize the critical situation presently existing at the Forge River shipyard; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Secretary of the Navy and the presiding officer of each branch of Congress and to the members thereof from this Commonwealth."

POM-375. A resolution adopted by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the current standard of living of many poor and elderly Americans is such that they are compelled to live in substandard housing and because of depressed finances are often unable to pay to adequately heat their living quarters; now therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts General Court respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to enact legislation that would give increased amounts of direct rental assistance to house poor and elderly citizens in the two, three and four-family homes of their communities through local housing and redevelopment authorities; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the President of the United States, the presiding officer of each branch of Congress and to the members thereof from this Commonwealth."

POM-376. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 18

"Whereas, International trade is an integral and vital part of the California economy, accounting for over one million jobs, 17% of our gross state product, and 25% of our agricultural sales; and

"Whereas, The United States and California have experienced rising and record international trade deficits over the past three years; and

"Whereas, These deficits have been responsible for lower economic growth, higher unemployment, widespread bankruptcies and foreclosures, and a substantial loss of export sales; and

"Whereas, California's agricultural industry has been particularly hard hit by successive declines in export sales of 21% in 1982 and another 8% in 1983; and

"Whereas, These growing trade deficits, unless they are soon reversed, may cause the permanent loss of export markets for California farmers and manufacturers; and

"Whereas, The rising burden of farm sector debt and loss of export markets threaten an increasing wave of farm foreclosures and bankruptcies; and

"Whereas, The economic hardships resulting from the massive trade deficits have brought, and will continue to bring, inordinate pressures on government for protectionist measures; and

"Whereas, Forty years of progress towards freer markets, expanding international trade, and vastly improved standards of living around the world would be jeopardized by increasing protectionism; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President, the Congress, and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System of the United States to provide the strong, prompt, and decisive leadership necessary to reverse the growing U.S. trade deficits; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature respectfully memorializes the President, the Congress, and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System of the United States to exercise the monetary and fiscal policies necessary to reduce U.S. interest rates, to discourage foreign exchange market speculation which has contributed to an overvalued U.S. dollar, and to encourage other nations to assist in reducing the current lopsided U.S. trade deficit; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-377. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 17

"Whereas, The mix of foreign and domestic shipping at ports on the West Coast of the United States is an important aspect of the economic health and vitality of our nation and its respective states; and

"Whereas, The regulation of vessels and marine affairs which is not achieved by consensus and cooperation among the states and with the federal government causes confusion and conflict to vessel operators and can negatively impact state and federal efforts to increase the use of West Coast ports for foreign trade; and

"Whereas, Air emission standards imposed by various federal, state, and local entities are a complicated and confusing set of policies which affect domestic and foreign vessels differently; and

"Whereas, The Clean Air Act is an example of a law which is unclear as to whether the state and local jurisdictions are preempted from imposing vessel air emission standards; and

"Whereas, Seventy percent of vessel activities on the West Coast and almost 80 percent in California are by foreign flag vessels whose air emissions cannot be successfully regulated by state or local government; and

"Whereas, The practice has been for the United States to deal internationally with foreign governments regarding agreements concerning maritime issues, such as the safety of life at sea; and

"Whereas, Uniformity is desirable in vessel air emission standards so that it is not discriminatory against domestic vessels and their operators; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to undertake or to direct the United States Coast Guard to undertake a study on vessel air emission standards which recognizes the importance of uniformity and its effect on foreign trade; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Transportation, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-378. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 15

"Whereas, The federal Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972, as amended, was enacted to encourage the coastal states to establish and carry out effective and enforceable coastal management programs for the purpose of preserving, protecting, beneficially using, and developing coastal resources in a manner that promotes local, state, and national interests; and

"Whereas, The federal act provides for incentives, including financial assistance through grants to coastal states, and, once a state coastal program has been certified by the Secretary of Commerce as being in conformity with the act, requires all federal agencies conducting or supporting activities which affect the state's coastal zone to carry out those activities in a manner consistent with the approved state coastal program; and

"Whereas, The people of this state adopted Proposition 20 in 1972, and the California Legislature subsequently enacted the California Coastal Act of 1976, on the understanding that the federal act authorizes states with federally approved coastal management programs to review federal activities which affect the state's coastal zone for consistency with its own coastal program and provides financial assistance to California for the purpose of managing this nation's coastal resources in California; and

"Whereas, The California Legislature enacted the "McAteer-Petris Act" in 1969 creating the San Francisco Bay Conservation and Development Commission, and the Suisun Marsh Preservation Act of 1977, that formed the basis of the San Francisco Bay segment of California's Coastal Management Program for the purpose of managing this nation's coastal resources in San Francisco Bay; and

"Whereas, Nearly thirty million dollars ($30,000,000) of the fifty million dollars ($50,000,000) expended to prepare, adopt, and implement California's coastal program, which was approved by the United States Department of Commerce in 1977, has been provided to the state by the federal government under the authority of the federal act; and

"Whereas, California's coastal program established a unique partnership between state and local governments under which local governments assume much of the state's burden for managing coastal resources after local governments have prepared local coastal programs consistent with the policies of the California Coastal Act of 1976 and local protection programs consistent with the provisions of the Suisun Marsh Preservation Act of 1977 and the Suisun Marsh Protection Plan; and

"Whereas, The California Coastal Act of 1976 requires that not less than 50 percent of the funds received by the state pursuant to the federal act be used for the preparation, review, approval, certification, or implementation of local coastal programs; and

"Whereas, The State of California and its local coastal governments have made good progress in completing the local coastal programs required by the California Coastal Act of 1976 and the State of California and Suisun Marsh local governments have completed the local protection program required by the Suisun Marsh Preservation Act of 1977; and

"Whereas, The California Coastal Commission and the San Francisco Bay Conservation and Development Commission have, in numerous cases, exercised the federal consistency review authority provided pursuant to the federal act, to ensure that federal activities are conducted in a manner which takes into account, and is protective of, state and local government interest and concerns; and

"Whereas, The authority of the federal government to provide financial assistance to California and the other coastal states will terminate in 1985 unless reauthorized by the President and the Congress; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to reauthorize the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 so that California and other coastal states can continue to carry out their responsibilities to the citizens of the nation in wisely protecting, managing, and developing coastal resources; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-379. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 4

"Whereas, While the National Academy of Sciences recommends that the 55 miles per hour speed limit be retained on most highways, some members felt that it would be appropriate to raise the speed limit on selected highways; and

"Whereas, Data reported by the State of Californnia to the Federal Highway Administration shows that compliance with the 55 miles per hour National Maximum Speed Limit is deteriorating in California; and

"Whereas, There is a common perception that public support for the 55 miles per hour National Maximum Speed Limit is eroding; and

"Whereas, Speeds are higher on most rural freeways as compared to urban freeways, while fatal and injury accidents are less frequent on rural freeways than urban freeways; and

"Whereas, The State of California can be sanctioned by the federal government when 50 percent or more of the traffic is reported as traveling at speeds greater than 55 miles per hour, resulting in the loss of twenty-eight million dollars ($28,000,000) of federal highway funds; and

"Whereas, The State of California can be sanctioned by the federal government if the state's 55 miles per hour maximum speed law is repealed, and this could result in a substantial loss of federal highway funds; and

"Whereas, There are three states which have been advised they are subject to federal sanctions; and

"Whereas, The Calfornia Highway Patrol has maintained wide-ranging routine and special enforcement programs in an effort to improve highway safety and avoid federal sanctions and approximately 1,000,000 violators are arrested annually, which is more than in any other state and is approximately twice the state total prior to the enactment of the 55 miles per hour speed limit; and

"Whereas, The 55 miles per hour National Maximum Speed Limit had become a dominant focus of the California Highway Patrol law enforcement efforts, with as many as two out of ever five arrests being for maximum speed violations, and although these efforts would be considered by the United States Department of Transportation during sanction negotiations, greater safety benefits may be possible if law enforcement resources were redeployed to driving under the influence or other violation problems; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to allow state legislatures to raise the maximum speed limit on selected freeways; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States"

POM-380. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 34

"Whereas, United Airlines, the largest airline serving California and the employer of some 15,000 persons in the state, and Pan American World Airways have entered into an agreement whereby United Airlines will purchase Pan American's pacific division; and

"Whereas, The traveling public and the shipping public will benefit from direct, single-plane, and on-line connecting service from United Airlines among all 50 states, including 15 cities served in California, and the Far East; and

"Whereas, The acquisition furthers United States aviation policy by ensuring a strong United States flag presence in the Far East, thereby benefiting and expanding trade and commerce between California and the lucrative Far East marketplace; and

"Whereas, The acquisition will benefit both Pan American World Airways and United Airlines, will protect the employees of Pan American, including those employees in California who will be offered employment opportunities with United Airlines, and will expand the United Airlines workforce as additional feeder and international flights are added in California; and

"Whereas, The United Airlines-Pan American World Airways agreement is subject to the approval of the United States Department of Transportation and the President of the United States and delay in granting that approval will adversely affect travelers, shippers, employees, and travel agents; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California urges the United States Secreary of Transportation Elizabeth H. Dole to expedite the application for approval of the United Airlines-Pan American World Airways agreement in order to preserve the competitive position of the United States in the Far East and to ensure a smooth transition, to reduce uncertainty for travelers, and to strengthen the economic and trade opportunities for the United States and, in particular, the State of California on the Pacific Rim, and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the United States Secretary of Transportation, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-381. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 32

"Whereas, Section 1304 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. Sec. 1301 et seq.) requires that imported commodities of foreign origin, or their containers, be legibly and conspicuously marked to show the English name of the country of origin; and

"Whereas, These commodities are exempt from the country of origin markings where the product undergoes a substantial transformation due to further processing resulting in a new and different article of commerce with a different name, character, or use; and

"Whereas, In response to a February 11, 1985, United States Customs Service notice in the Federal Register, and after a request for comments on country of origin marking of imported pistachios, the California Pistachio Commission has presented significant and compelling evidence that imported pistachios are not substantially transformed in the United States; and

"Whereas, The country of origin marking should be required for imported pistachios because the roasting process does not substantially transform the raw product; and

"Whereas, Unmarked Iranian pistachios have been marketed in this country under such deceptive labels as 'Pride of California' and thereby capture 45 percent of the United States market and cost California growers $20 million in earning; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislative respectfully memorializes the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Enforcement and Operations to take immediate action to adopt the proposal noticed by the United States Customs Service in the Federal Register on February 11, 1985, as it specifically relates to pistachios; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Enforcement and Operations recognize the urgency of this request and the deceptive marketing of imported Iranian pistachios; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Enforcement and Operations, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Majority Leader of the Senate, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress."

POM-382. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 3

"Whereas, It has been brought to the attention of the California Legislature through correspondence of the Order of St. Andrew the Apostle, a private nonprofit corporation with offices at the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, that the civil liberties of Greeks living in Turkey have been repeatedly threatened and denied; and

"Whereas, The California Legislature is justly proud of its long and unyielding commitment to the pervasive extension of freedom; and

"Whereas, The military junta headed by General Evren in Ankara has decreed that Turkish citizens of Greek descent cannot buy or sell real estate, thus creating the expectation that their homes and businesses will be confiscated; and

"Whereas, Turkish officials recently visited the worldwide center of Orthodox Christianity, known as Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople and called Istanbul by Moslems; and

"Whereas, In this holy place, which corresponds to the Vatican, all sacred items are registered and declared the national property of Turkey; and

"Whereas, The famous Greek Orthodox School of Theology on the island of Halki, from which renowned religious leaders (including His All Holiness, Ecumenical Patriarch Demetrios I. and His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, Greek Orthodox Primate of the Americas) have graduated, is now a modest high school with a Turkish principal; and

"Whereas, While Turkish law prohibits any repair work to Christian churches, schools, businesses, or homes exceeding two hundred fifty liras (or less than two dollars) without a permit, such permits are systematically denied to Greek Orthodox residents of the country; and

"Whereas, There are continuous efforts to seize the income-producing properties willed by Greek Orthodox people to the famous hospital in Baluki, Istanbul, which treats all members of the community regardless of religion or nationality; and

"Whereas, At least 300 Greek Orthodox families were forced to flee Turkey last year because of these and other oppressive conditions; and

"Whereas, In addition, the ethnically Greek population of Turkey has dwindled from half a million at the turn of the century to fewer than 5,000, and 92 percent of those who remain are age 65 or older; and

"Whereas, These facts strongly suggest a Turkish policy of retrenchment and, indeed, of active persecution of those of Greek heritage; and

"Whereas, It is the intent of the California Legislature to urge that the United States government investigate these charges and, of substantiated, bring to bear upon the Turkish government appropriate economic and political pressure to correct the suppression of civil liberties; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memoralizes the President and the Congress of the United States to petition the Turkish government to effect the protection of the civil liberties of Orthodox Christians; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-383. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 19

"Whereas, El Salvador, a small, densely populated country, has close to five million people in an area the size of Massachusetts; and

"Whereas, For decades, the country was run by and for the plantation owners, a small group of people of European descent traditionally referred to as the "Fourteen Families"; and

"Whereas, Popular unrest broke out during the army's massacre of between 10,000 and 30,000 Salvadoran citizens; and

"Whereas, The period between 1945 and 1979 was characterized by military rule, widespread corruption, fraudulent elections, and military repression of all political opposition; and

"Whereas, There occur continual instances of torture, mutilation, disappearances, and the individual and mass extrajudicial execution of men, women, and children from all sectors of Salvadoran society, perpetrated by extremist factions on all sides within and beyond the government; and

"Whereas, There has been a massive increase in the number of both internal and external refugees and displaced persons; and

"Whereas, During the last five years, as a result of the civil war, civilians have been killed in numbers totaling over 40,000, a figure constituting approximately one percent of the population and comparable to 1,750,000 civilian deaths in a country the size of the United States; and

"Whereas, The United States has an honorable tradition of accepting refugees from abroad who have suffered political repression during a period of civil conflict as demonstrated by the fact that the United States has granted extended voluntary departure status 15 times in the past 24 years, and the status currently is granted to Poles, Ethiopians, Afghans, and Ugandans; and

"Whereas, Thousands of refugees have fled El Salvador for fear of being harmed by the repression and hostilities that continue daily in the context of an internal civil strife; and

"Whereas, The United States, to date, has not fully accepted responsibility for its humanitarian obligation toward Salvadoran refugees, refusing to grant them political asylum or even extended voluntary departure status, and has forcibly repatriated over 35,000 people to El Salvador; and

"Whereas, Innocent men, women, and children are presently without a country and live with the realization that their return to El Salvador would once again place their lives in jeopardy in a country ravaged by an ongoing catastrophic civil conflict; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memoralizes the Congress of the United States to recognize that the refugees from El Salvador are "political refugees" and to grant them asylum or extended voluntary departure status, and to enact, as a temporary measure, the Moakley-DeConcini Bill; and be it further

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 9

"Whereas, The California Legislature has enacted comprehensive laws regulating programs for the delivery of prepaid and reimbursed health care, including health care service plans, nonprofit hospital service plans, and disability insurance; and

"Whereas, California's laws protect the interest of citizens enrolled in these health care programs by requiring financial solvency of the plans and insurers, adequacy of the care provided to our citizens as patients, freedom of choice in selecting the health care provider desired by the patient, and other elements supporting fiscal responsibility and good patient care; and

"Whereas, The federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) has preempted state laws in the regulation of health care plans and programs in order to assure uniform employee benefit plans throughout the United States, but this explicit preemption has precluded the states from mandating additional benefits or protections for employees; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation amending the Employee Retirement Income Security Act to narrow its preemption provisions to permit the states to enact legislation which will provide benefits in addition to the protections required by ERISA and encourage states to achieve parity between insured and self-insured benefits; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-385. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 19

"Whereas, The United States of America and the People's Republic of China in December 1978 simultaneously issued a joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States of America and the People's Republic of China, wherein the United States of America and the People's Republic of China agreed to recognize each other and to establish diplomatic relations as of January 1, 1979; and

"Whereas, The joint communique expresses that the United States will maintain cultural, commercial, and other unofficial relations with the people of Taiwan; and

"Whereas, The California Legislature recognizes the friendly relations which have mutually existed between the people of California and the people of Taiwan, and therefore in 1983 on behalf of the people of the State of California through Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 40, Resolution Chapter 120, extended to the people of Taiwan an invitation to join California as a sister state and to conduct mutually beneficial social, economic, educational, and cultural programs in order to bring our citizens closer together and to strengthen international understanding and good will; and

"Whereas, The People's Republic of China has expressed great interest in establishing friendship state relationships with states of the union in the United States of America in order to foster greater friendship and understanding between the United States and the People's Republic of China and to facilitate international trade and commerce between the two nations; and

"Whereas, Fourteen such friendship state relationships have been established between a Chinese province and an American state; and

"Whereas, Under the guidance of the principles as embodied in the joint communique on the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China, numerous sister city relationships have been established between American and Chinese cities, among which are the sister city pairings of San Francisco-Shanghai, Los Angeles-Guangzhou, Oakland-Dalien, Sacramento-Jinan, and Long Beach-Qingdao; and

"Whereas, The people of Jiangsu Province of the People's Republic of China are desirous of entering into a friendship state relationship with the State of California in order to promote for mutual benefit the exchange of trade and commerce and the conduct of scientific, technical, agricultural, and educational programs which will enhance the potential for economic activity in California and Jiangsu; and

"Whereas, The Province of Jiangsu and the State of California share much in common in topography, climate, and industry; and

"Whereas, Jiangsu Province presents the opportunity for increased trade markets and the export of ideas, technology, products, and equipment from California, enhancement of international cooperation and communication, and social and cultural interchange which would facilitate understanding and goodwill between the citizens of California and Jiangsu Province; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of California, the Assembly thereof concurring, That the California Legislature, on behalf of the people of California, declares Jiangsu Province as a friendship state, extends to the people of Jiangsu Province of the People's Republic of China an invitation to join California as a friendship state, and commits to the establishment of programs which will further the friendship state relationship; and be it further

"Resolved, That the appropriate state officials are encouraged to immediately contact the government of Jiangsu in order to negotiate a friendship agreement between Jiangsu and California which furthers mutual understanding and strengthening of friendly relations, enhances international trade and commerce, and facilitates the exchange of culture, education, science and technology; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the Governor of Jiangsu Province, the Governor of California, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLVE NO. 17

"Whereas approximately 2,600,000,000 pounds of Alaska pollock is harvested annually, and much of this harvest is either taken by Japanese fishing vessels or purchased by the Japanese fishing industry from the American fishing industry; and

"Whereas Japanese industry utilizes approximately 70 percent of its supply of Alaska pollock for the production of surimi and surimi products, and a significant portion of this production is then exported to the United States, where surimi usage has risen from less than 1,000 tons in 1979 to 30,000 tons in 1984; and

"Whereas the American fishing industry receives approximately $.05 a pound for pollock, while the finished surimi products exported from Japan to the United States sell for approximately $1.75 a pound, aggravating the U.S. trade deficit that was $4,000,000,000 in 1984 for fishery products alone; and

"Whereas the capacity of the U.S. fishing fleet to harvest Alaska pollock has increased tremendously in recent years, with the American fishing industry harvesting almost 500,000 tons of pollock in 1984; and

"Whereas the surimi products presently used in the U.S. can be produced from just 102,000 tons of Alaska pollock; and

"Whereas Alaskan surimi is a wholesome food product, made from fresh-caught North Pacific pollock, and dollar for dollar has as much or more nutritional value than many traditional seafood products; and

"Whereas the U.S. Food and Drug Administration is requiring surimi marketed in the form of crab strips and other seafood analogue products to be inappropriately labeled as 'imitation,' and this labeling requirement would discourage sales of this nutritious product and the development of a new domestic industry; and

"Whereas surimi has great potential as a functional protein ingredient for many products in addition to seafood analogues, and the U.S. market for surimi in all forms continues to grow; and

"Whereas projections indicate that establishing a complete pollock surimi industry, including harvesting, processing, distribution and sales in the U.S., would produce a $6,000,000,000-a-year industry; and

"Whereas Alaska Pacific Seafoods in Kodiak, Alaska, in conjunction with the Alaska Fisheries Development Foundation, has demonstrated that top-quality surimi can be produced commercially in on-shore American facilities; and

"Whereas Alaska Pacific Seafood will produce an initial pack of 860,000 pounds of surimi for use by the Alaska Fisheries Development Foundation to encourage growth of the U.S. market for domestically produced surimi; and

"Whereas funding for this project was provided by the federal government through a Saltonstall-Kennedy grant to the Alaska Fisheries Development Foundation, with matching money and in-kind services provided by industry, fishing groups, and individuals;

"Be it resolved that the Alaska State Legislature expresses its appreciation for this project and gratitude for their support, to the United States Congress, the U.S. Department of Commerce National Marine Fisheries Service, and the many industry organizations, fishery groups, and individuals that contributed to the success of this project; and be it

"Further resolved by the Alaska State Legislature that it respectfully requests the United States Congress, the United States Department of Commerce National Marine Fisheries Service, and other concerned groups to continue their support for this project because it has the potential to encourage the full domestic use of the resources of the United States Fisheries Conservation Zone and to enhance the economic well-being of all persons in Alaska and in the other states of the nation; and be it

"Further resolved by the Alaska State Legislature that it respectfully requests the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to work with the seafood processing industry to develop a label other than 'imitation' to distinguish, as a consumer service, surimi products from traditional seafood products.

"Whereas Congress is now considering legislation that includes provisions concerning the foreign export of Alaskan crude oil; and

"Whereas there are proposals before Congress to change existing federal law that effectively prohibit the foreign export of Alaskan crude oil; and

"Whereas the export of Alaskan crude oil would improve the national security of the United States by strengthening the defensive capabilities of our Pacific Rim allies; and

"Whereas the export of Alaskan crude oil would encourage increased domestic oil exploration and development; and

"Whereas Japan, Korea, and Taiwan have each expressed interest in obtaining Alaskan crude oil to diversify their energy sources; and

"Whereas the export of Alaskan crude oil would decrease the federal trade deficit with these nations; and

"Whereas exporting Alaskan crude oil to these nations would mitigate panic buying in the spot markets, thus moderating the cost of petroleum products for all consumers; and

"Whereas it is far more costly to ship oil from Alaska through the Panama Canal and to the Gulf Coast than to ship directly to the Pacific Rim; and

"Whereas the additional cost of shipping Alaska's oil to the Gulf Coast and Eastern states imposes an unnecessary burden on the consumers of those states; and

"Whereas under the International Energy Agreement, the United States is required to export crude oil to participating nations in the event of a worldwide disruption of oil supplies;

"Whereas, the petroleum industry is a vital part of this nation's economy; and

"Whereas, fluctuation in the price of petroleum due to worldwide production and market conditions can place the petroleum industry in and unstable position which, in turn, can have a very negative effect on this country's financial status; and

"Whereas, it would be catastrophic for this nation's petroleum producers if the international price of oil and other petroleum products should drop from the current level; and

"Whereas the treaty provides for a carefully studied, scientifically controlled harvest of two-year old subadult nonbreeding males only; and

"Whereas there is no scientific evidence to indicate the current level of the commercial harvest of subadult male seals contributes to any decline in the fur seal population, but to the contrary, evidence suggests that culling subadult males contributes to the overall health of the fur seal herd; and

"Whereas cooperative and strengthened research, education, management and enforcement programs are the keys to the conservation of the North Pacific fur seal and these activities can best be carried out through the fur seal treaty; and

"Whereas the National Audubon Society, a respected conservation organization with more than a half-million members, has endorsed the renewal of the fur seal treaty; and

"Whereas a national campaign, featuring misleading and inaccurate information, has been launched by various wildlife groups to convince the United States Senate to reject the treaty; and

"Whereas a hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee will afford the representatives of the Pribilof Islands an opportunity to refute the misleading charges made by the treaty opponents, and to present, under oath, substantiated, scientific information in support of the continuation of the fur seal treaty; and

"Whereas not to provide for a fair hearing on this issue would be disastrous for the

Aleut people and would open the way for special interest groups to attack other essential subsistence activities, such as trapping, whaling, and fishing;

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 1640. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for coverage under the Medicare Program of services performed by a physician assistant; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE COVERAGE OF PHYSICIAN ASSISTANT SERVICES

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which will clarify and expand coverage of physician assistant services under the Medicare Part B Program. This piece of legislation will increase access to health care for Medicare beneficiaries without increasing the cost of the Medicare Program.

As my colleagues are aware, physician assistants services are covered under part B of Medicare when PA's render their service in a certified rural health clinic. Reimbursement to the employing clinic was authorized in 1977 by the Rural Health Clinic Services Act, Public Law 95-210. The Medicare Program also covers physician assistant services when provided in health maintenance organizations [HMO's]. Unfortunately, physician assistant services rendered in other settings to Medicare beneficiaries are not covered under part B.

In addition to the problems this creates for Medicare beneficiaries, the Federal Government is failing to reap the full benefit of the health manpower training programs by not covering physician assistant services under Medicare.

For instance, on July 19, the Senate unanimously passed the health manpower amendments of 1985. Included in this bill was an authorization to spend approximately $14 million over the next 3 years on physician assistant training programs, a worthwhile expenditure and one which I supported.

But due to the inconsistency in Federal policy, we are helping to educate health care professionals whose services are of no benefit to millions of Medicare beneficiaries. My legislation seeks to eliminate this problem by providing for the coverage of physician assistant services under part B of Medicare.

Because the States have the responsibility for determining the scope of practice for physician assistants within that State, my bill would cover only physician assistant services to the extent allowable under State law. In other words, my legislation would not usurp State authority to regulate the activities of physician assistants.

I also want to point out, Mr. President, that there is a significant difference between my bill and other pieces of legislation promoted by other health professionals. Specifically, my bill would not create a new provider because reimbursement would be to the employing physician and not to the physician assistant. As my colleagues are aware, physician assistants are dependent health care practitioners who only practice under the direction and supervision of a physician. My bill maintains that supervisory relationship.

Furthermore, my bill calls for reimbursement for physician assistant services at a rate slightly lower than the reimbursement rate which would have been paid had the physician rendered the services. Because of the slighty lower reimbursement rate, the Congressional Budget Office has determined that the effect of the bill is revenue neutral.

The increased access and the resultant increased cost to Medicare are offset by the lower reimbursement rate of my bill. I want to make it clear that I do not consider physician assistant services to be of lesser value than physician services. However, I recognize that in today's budget climate, it is impossible to recommend legislation that would increase Medicare costs and expect it to be seriously considered.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Congressional Budget Office to Congressman WYDEN regarding the budgetary impact of this legislation be included in the RECORD at the end of my statement. I also ask unanimous consent to insert a copy of an article from the Waterloo Courier on how current Medicare laws hamper the utilization of physician assistant services in rural Iowa.

Mr. President, physician assistants are highly educated, cost-effective members of the health care team. Their role in ensuring quality health care at affordable prices has been clearly demonstrated. Congress acted wisely in expanding the Medicare Program to cover physician assistant services performed in rural health clinics and health maintenance organizations. I trust my colleagues will join me in continuing that process by covering physician assistant services in other settings as well. My bill should serve to increase access of Medicare beneficiaries to quality health care, particularly in highly rural areas where shortages of physicians may exist.

I also wish to thank my distinguished colleague, Congressman RON WYDEN, for introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my bill, and the two documents mentioned earlier, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1640

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That

(a) SERVICES COVERED.—Section 1861(s)(2) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (H);

(2) by adding "and" at the end of subparagraph (I); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(J)(i) services furnished by a physician assistant (as defined in subsection (aa)(3)) which such physician assistant is legally authorized to perform under the State law or State regulatory mechanism of the State in which the services are performed, if such physician assistant is under the supervision of a physician described in subsection (r)(1), and

"(ii) services and supplies furnished as an incident to the services described in clause (i) which would be covered under subparagraph (A) if furnished by a physician or incident to a physician's professional service;".

(b) PAYMENT AMOUNT.—Section 1833(a)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "and" before "(F)" and by adding at the end thereof the following: "and (G) with respect to services described in section 1861(s)(2)(J), the amounts paid shall be equal to 90 percent of the amounts which would otherwise be paid if such services were furnished by the physician under whose supervision the physician assistant furnishes such services.".

(c) PAYMENT TO BE MADE TO EMPLOYER.—The first sentence of section 1842(b)(6) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "except that payment may be made (A)(i)" and inserting in lieu thereof "except that (A) payment may be made (i)";

(2) by striking out "or (B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(B) payment may be made"; and

(3) by inserting before the period the following: ", and (C) payment shall be made to the employer of the physician assistant in the case of services described in section 1861(s)(2)(J)".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this Act shall apply to services furnished in or after the fourth month which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
U.S. CONGRESS,
Washington, DC, November 5, 1984.

Hon. RON WYDEN,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your letter of February 17, 1984, we have examined the costs of your draft legislation to extend Medicare coverage to physician assistants working in private practice settings. Under current law Medicare does not reimburse for services performed by a physician assistant (PA) if those services are normally performed by a physician. Under this proposal, PA services could be reimbursed at up to 90 percent of that allowed for the billing physician. In addition, the physician would be required to accept assignment for physician assistant charges.

Based on our review of your draft legislation, it is expected that no significant cost or saving to the government would be incurred as a result of enactment of this legislation. Although encouraging the use of PAs in the treatment of Medicare beneficiaries could foster competition and lead to lower prices in the long run, we expect the magnitude of those changes would be small during this decade. Our findings are based on the following considerations.

By definition, philosophy and state laws, PAs practice only under the supervision of a licensed physician. The proposed change does not encourage, or even allow, PAs to practice independently of physicians. In fact, under the proposed legislation PAs would continue to be employed by, supervised by, and billed under the practice of a licensed physician.

Medicare beneficiaries may prefer treatment from MDs rather than from PAs. Furthermore, the Medicare patient has only a small incentive to seek treatment from the lower priced PA. At the margin the patient pays a coinsurance of only 20 percent. For example, reduction in the charge for an office visit from $30.00 to $27.00 is a savings of only 60 cents to the Medicare patient, and this small difference frequently is paid by Medicaid or private Medi-Gap policies. Therefore, the proposed legislation is unlikely to create new demands by Medicare beneficiaries for PAs.

Many physicians may not enjoy practice styles that involve considerably less patient contact and considerably more personnel management. Therefore, physicians may demand and receive higher salaries for managing practices that involve the use of PAs. Physicians are unlikely to make major changes in their practice styles in response to changes in reimbursement that affect only the use of PAs for their Medicare patients.

Physicians currently employ PAs in their practices even though most private and public insurers do not allow separate billing for PAs.

There are fewer than 10,000 PAs in practice. Even if their use with Medicare patients is encouraged slightly by a change in payment practices, many additional PAs must be trained and licensed before their numbers can have a significant impact on Medicare outlays.

We would be pleased to respond to any questions you might have on this estimate. Your staff may contact Jack Rodgers (226-2820) with detailed questions.

Sincerely,

RUDOLPH G. PENNER,
Director.

MEDICARE RULES, FEWER PATIENTS FORCE CLINIC TO PHASE OUT PHYSICIAN'S ASSISTANTS

(By Yvonne Beeler)

WEST UNION.—The first area medical clinic to incorporate physician's assistants into its daily medical practice has become the first clinic to eliminate them.

Barriers imposed by Medicare regulations and decreased patient flow have forced the West Union Medical Clinic to phase out two PAs employed at its facilities for eight years. One PA will leave Monday and the second will work until new employment is found.

"Regulations within Medicare are too restrictive for our family-type setting," according to Dr. David Freed, head of the West Union clinic.

Medicare will not reimburse a PA who has administered medical services to a Medicare patient. Additionally, Medicare requires a physician to have direct supervision over a PA.

"We were having two people seeing one patient, when only one was necessary," Freed noted.

Dr. Dennis Oliver, director of the PA training program at the University of Iowa, Iowa City, agrees with Freed in that Medicare payments have put a "damper" on the PA program since its inception.

Still, Oliver said there has been a yearly increase in the number of PA graduates, with 35 to 40 now graduating annually. About 215 are currently employed in Iowa.

West Union was the first community in Northeast Iowa to take advantage of the PA program. The PAs were hired eight years ago to help alleviate the patient load on physicians at the clinic.

But the patient flow has switched in recent years, and is now declining. Coupled with the Medicare barrier, Freed said the clinic was forced to make an economic decision and phase out the PAs. The clinic will still employ a PA at the Fayette satellite office because a "steady need" exists there.

The practice of employing physician's assistants began in the early 1970s as a means to provide medical services in rural Iowa, where communities were unable to recruit resident physicians.

PAs are not licensed doctors, but may perform routine medical tasks, including physicals and examinations. PAs cannot prescribe drugs, perform surgery or other medical services reserved for physicians.

West Union appears to be the only clinic in the area to eliminate its PAs. Oliver said he is not aware of other clinics following suit.

Between one and five PAs are now working in each of 11 area counties—Buchanan, Benton, Tama, Grundy, Butler, Bremer, Chickasaw, Franklin, Hardin, Howard and Mitchell. Between six and 10 PAs are employed in Fayette and Black Hawk counties. There are no PAs employed in Floyd or Winneshiek counties, Oliver reported.

Initially, PAs were finding jobs throughout rural Iowas. PAs are now moving into the metro hospitals, away from the smaller communities and rural health clinics.

"Most obvious, the convenience of medical service is no longer available (when a PA leaves)," Oliver said, referring to the shift in employment locations. "Less (medical) care is provided now with no PAs in the rural areas. Small towns are at a disadvantage because people must travel to a doctor, in spite of weather of other hinderances."

He noted the Medicare regulations have also contributed to the move of PAs into larger hospitals. Oliver said it seems more Medicare patients reside in smaller towns than in larger communities.

From the start, Medicare has always required that a doctor have direct supervision over all employees.

"This doesn't mean the physician must be standing over an employee's shoulder, just be readily available," according to Phil Chiuarelli, of the Health Care Financing Administration in Kansas City, which administers Medicare and Medicaid payments.

Despite the loss of the PAs, Freed is attempting to expand the number of offices operated by the West Union clinic. A satellite clinic in Calmar is scheduled to open this fall, with a doctor being recruited for that site.

"We'll definitely miss our PAs," Freed said. "They've been a big help to us and they leave highly recommended."●

HEALTH CARE LEGISLATION

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, today I am introducing a package of health care bills on behalf of Health and Human Services Secretary Heckler and the Reagan administration.

The Health Research Amendments of 1985, the Health Maintenance Amendments of 1985, the Health Services Amendments of 1985, and the Health Professions Amendments of 1985, represent an ongoing effort by the administration to provide a streamlined and cost-effective Federal involvement in national health care policy.

In July of this year, Secretary Heckler announced that the Nation's health spending increased at the slowest rate in 20 years during 1984, with the rate of growth dipping below double digits for the first time since 1965. Total health spending in 1984 was $387 billion, up 9.1 percent from 1983. The increase compares with spending growth of 10.6 percent in 1983 and 15.3 percent in 1980, the highest single-year increase. In addition, Secretary Heckler said, the total spending amount for 1984 represents 10.6 percent of gross national product, down from 10.7 percent in the previous year and the first decrease in health spending as a percentage of GNP since 1978. These bills are the fruits of the administration's procompetitive health policies. This legislation seeks to aim the Federal role in the direction which will continue these accomplishments.

The Health Maintenance Amendments of 1985 would eliminate Federal support for HMO's in an orderly fashion by repealing the authorities for Federal financial support for HMO's. In addition, this measure would eliminate, as of October of 1987, the requirement that each employer offer employees the choice of enrollment in an HMO if the employer offered other health benefits plans to the employees.

The HMO legislation was passed to encourage the development of HMO's both through marketing leverage and financial support. Since enactment of the act in 1973, the industry has grown dramatically. There were 72 plans with 3.5 million members when the act was passed. As of June 1984, the number of HMO's had grown to 311 with 15.2 million members. HMO's are now accepted in many areas as a cost effective means of delivering health care. It is, therefore, the administration's belief that there is little justification for continued Federal intervention in this market.

The Health Professions Amendments of 1985 would authorize the Secretary of Health and Human Services to insure loans under the Health Education Assistance Loans Programs through fiscal 1988. The bill would also enact a number of proposals designed to assist the Department of Health and Human Services in carrying out its health professions training responsibilities as effectively and efficiently as possible. In addition, the bill would eliminate health professions training categorical program authorities, including nursing authorities.

The Health Services Amendments of 1985 consolidates into a single block grant the Community Health Centers and Primary Care, Black Lung Clinics, Family Planning Services, and Migrant Health Services primary care programs. In addition, the measure reauthorizes the Adolescent Family Life Program, repeals the Health Planning authorities, reauthorizes the National Health Service Corps Field Program, and makes a number of other amendments to improve the efficiency of the health services programs.

The Health Research Amendments of 1985 would authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 through 1988 for National Research Service Awards and for assistance to medical libraries. The bill legislates only where legislation is needed. The NRSA's and aid to libraries are the only activities of the National Institutes of Health for which funds cannot be appropriated under the broad research mandate of section 301 of the Public Health Service Act. The bill would also enact a number of proposals designed to assist the Department of Health and Human Services in carrying out its health research responsibilities as effectively and efficiently as possible. The administration intends to seek appropriations for cancer, cardiovascular, lung, blood, and other health research activities based on the general research authority in section 301 of the Public Health Services Act.

Mr. President, I wish to commend Secretary Heckler and the administration for their efforts in controlling health care costs and for streamlining the Federal Government's involvement in the health care delivery system. While I support the general approach taken by the administration in those respective bills, each of the policy and program changes that are made do not necessarily reflect my personal views or the position which I feel are in the best interests of my constituents in the State of Wyoming. I introduce this legislative package so that the administration's proposals in the area of public health can be made part of the debate on funding levels and programmatic structure.

I would ask unanimous consent that the administration's legislative package be printed in the RECORD following my statement.

There being no objection, the package was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

(1) in subparagraph (A), by striking out "section 1302(8) of the Public Health Service act, other than subparagraph (C)" and inserting instead "paragraph (B)",

(2) by redesignating subparagraphs (A) and (B) as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively,

(3) by inserting "(A)" after designating "(3)", and

(4) by adding at the end the following:

"(B)(i) For purposes of paragraph (A), the term 'community rating system' means a system of fixing rates of payments for health services under which rates shall be fixed on a per-person or per-family basis and may vary with the number of persons in a family but, except as authorized in clause (ii), the rates must be equivalent for all individuals and for all families of similar composition.

"(ii) The following differentials in rates of payments may be established:

"(I) Nominal differentials in such rates may be established to reflect differences in marketing costs and the different administrative costs of collecting payments from the following categories of members: Individual members (including their families), small groups of members (as determined under regulations of the Secretary), and large groups of members (as determined under regulations of the Secretary).

"(II) Nominal differences in such rates may be established to reflect the compositing of the rates of payment in a systematic manner to accommodate group purchasing practices of various employers.

"(III) Differentials in such rates may be established for members enrolled pursuant to a contract with a government authority under section 1079 or 1086 of title 10, United States Code, or under any other governmental program (other than the health benefits program authorized by chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code) or any health benefits program for employees of States, political subdivisions of States, and other public entities.".

(j) Section 1876(i)(3)(C) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395mm(i)(3)(C)) is amended to read as follows:

"(C) shall require the organization to protect its members from incurring liability for payment of any fees which are the legal obligation of the organization through—

"(i) a contractual arrangement with any hospital that is regularly used by the members of the organization prohibiting the hospital from holding any such member liable for payment of any fees which are the legal obligation of the organization,

"(ii) insolvency insurance, acceptable to the Secretary,

"(iii) adequate financial reserve, acceptable to the Secretary, or

"(iv) other arrangements, acceptable to the Secretary, to protect members, except that the above requirement shall not apply if applicable State law provides the members of the organization with protection from liability for payment of any fees which are the legal obligation of the organization; and".

(k) Section 1902(e)(2)(A) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1396a(e)(2)(A)) is amended by striking out "a qualified health maintenance organization (as defined in title XIII of the Public Health Service Act)" and inserting instead "an eligible organization (as defined in section 1876(b))".

"(2) The Secretary shall reserve for the purpose of paragraph (1) from amounts that would otherwise be allotted to such State under subsection (a) an amount equal to the amount which bears the same ratio to the State's allotment for the fiscal year involved as the total amount provided for fiscal year 1985 by the Secretary to such tribe or tribal organization under the provisions of law referred to in subsection (a) bore to the total amount provided for such fiscal year by the Secretary to the State and entities (including Indian tribes and tribal organizations) in the State under such provisions of law.

"(3) The amount reserved by the Secretary on the basis of a determination under this subsection shall be granted to the Indian tribe or tribal organization serving the individuals for whom such a determination has been made.

"(4) In order for an Indian tribe or tribal organization to be eligible for a grant for a fiscal year under this subsection, it shall submit to the Secretary a plan for such fiscal year which meets such criteria as the Secretary may prescribe.

"(5) The terms 'Indian tribe' and 'tribal organizations' have the same meaning given such terms in section 4(b) and section 4(c) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.".

(3) Section 1924 (42 U.S.C. 300y-3) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(c) To the extent that all the funds appropriated under section 1922 for a fiscal year and available for allotment in such fiscal year are not otherwise allotted to States because—

"(1) one or more States have not submitted an application or description of activities in accordance with section 1927 for the fiscal year;

"(2) one or more States have notified the Secretary that they do not intend to use the full amount of their allotment; or

"(3) some State allotments are offset or repaid under section 1928(b)(3); such excess shall be allotted among each of the remaining States in proportion to the amount otherwise allotted to such States for the fiscal year without regard to this subsection.".

(e) Section 1925(a)(2) (42 U.S.C. 300y-4(a)(2)) is amended by striking out "if the Secretary determines that the State acted in accordance with section 1926(a)(1) and there is good cause for funds remaining unobligated".

"(c)(1) The base amount that the United States is entitled to recover under subsection (a) is the amount bearing the same ratio to the then value (as determined by the agreement of the parties or in an action brought in the district court of the United States for the district in which the facility is situated) of so much of the facility as constituted an approved project or projects as the amount of the Federal participation bore to the cost of the remodeling, construction, expansion, or acquisition of the project or projects.

"(2)(A) The interest that the United States is entitled to recover under subsection (a) is the interest for the period (if any) described in subparagraph (B) at a rate (determined quarterly) equal to 150 percent of the average bond equivalent rate of the thirteen week Treasury bills auctioned at the end of the preceding calendar quarter.

"(B) The period referred to in subparagraph (A) is the period beginning—

"(i) if notice is provided as prescribed by subsection (b), 191 days after the date of the sale, transfer, or cessation, or

"(ii) if notice is not provided as prescribed by subsection (b), 11 days after the sale, transfer, or cessation, and ending on the date the amount the United States is entitled to recover is collected.

"(d) The Secretary may waive the recovery rights of the United States under subsection (a) with respect to a facility (under such conditions as the Secretary may set in regulations) if the Secretary determines that there is good cause for waiving those rights.

"(e) The right of recovery of the United States under subsection (a) shall not prior to judgment constitute a lien on any facility.".

(d)(1) In the case of any facility that was or is constructed, remodeled, expanded, or acquired on or before the date of enactment of this Act (or within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act), the period described in subsection (c)(2)(B)(i) of sections 723, 804, and 2115 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 293c, 296c, and 300aa-14) (as amended by the preceding subsections of this section) shall begin no earlier than 181 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) The amendments enacted by the preceding subsections of this section shall not adversely affect other legal rights of the United States.

S. 1645. A bill to delay a postal rate increase for subscription publications; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DELAY OF POSTAL RATE INCREASE FOR SUBSCRIPTION PUBLICATIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today I am joining my friends in introducing legislation that will delay for 6 months the recently announced postal rate increase as it affects subscription publications. This rate increase for subsidized mailers was agreed upon by the Board of Governors of the U.S. Postal Service during their September Board meeting.

As prudent as the Board decision was, unforunately, it still means that rural and small newspaper as well as school classroom publication publishers will be faced with an increase in the cost of sending out subscriptions by anywhere from 45 to 60 percent in approximately 4 weeks. Mr. President, these publishers simply cannot adjust that quickly to such a major postal rate increase, coming on top of an increase they already adjusted to in February of this year.

This is not a bailout or government largess. It is simply a wise policy of orderly withdrawal of a Federal subsidy in such a fashion so as not to cause the undue collapse in one of this Nation's treasures, the small and rural newspapers, as well as the educational publications of America.

This bill would cost approximately $40 million. The newspaper publishers of this Nation are competent businessmen and women and they understand the essential nature of reducing this national deficit, and they are willing to help. But, let's not reward their willingness by putting them out of business.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the text of the bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1645

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, There are authorized to be appropriated sufficient sums so that the rates for mail under former section 4358 of title 39, United States Code, shall remain at step 14 on the rate phasing schedule under section 3626 of such title through March 31, 1986.

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation introduced by my good friend and colleague, Senator STEVENS. I commend him for his leadership on this issue.

This legislation responds to a recent decision by the Postal Service's Board of Governors that will have a tremendous impact on small newspapers and educational publications. The Board recently announced a rate increase, effective October 1, 1985, which will raise the cost of sending out subscriptions by 45 to 60 percent. This is on top of the rate increase which took effect in February of this year.

Mr. President, small newspapers and educational publications cannot adjust to such a rate increase on this short notice. They are locked into subscription rates based on expectations of substantially lower postal rates. Many of these outstanding publications could be forced out of business.

The bill which I am cosponsoring will delay this increase by 6 months. Although this legislation does not prevent this increase from occurring after that 6 month period, it will give small newspapers and education publications a chance to adjust their subscription rates and to budget for the increase.

I urge my colleagues to join in cosponsoring this legislation.●

By Mr. LEVIN:

S. 1646. A bill to amend chapter 34 of title 38, United States Code, to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to afford educational assistance under such chapter to certain eligible veterans after the expiration of the 10-year delimiting period; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to provide for an extension of the eligiblity period for certain veterans to receive educational assistance. This bill addresses a situation faced by some of our veterans who are also married to members of the Armed Forces.

Congress has in the past recognized the sacrifices made by military spouses. The pressures of separation, frequent moves, and difficult living conditions are borne by military personnel and their families together. When military spouses are also former members of the military, they may face the additional problem of not being able to take full advantage of the educational benefits available to them by virtue of their having served in the Armed Forces.

Veterans affected by this legislation are currently given 10 years in which to utilize their educational benefits. This 10-year period takes into account the fact that the restrictions of military life often prevent service men and women from attaining their educational goals during their years in the service. In some cases, however, the 10-year period is not enough. When eligible veterans are also married to a member of the Armed Forces, they continue under the same restrictions that they faced before leaving the military. These spouses may have left the service in the formal sense, but, for all practical purposes, they are still in the military. The military husband or wife may be assigned to a base in a remote area, too far from an institution offering a program appropriate to the veteran's educational objectives. If this situation continues for all or most of the 10-year eligibility period, it is hard to see how these veterans can utilize the educational benefits to which they are entitled.

Current law allows for an extension of the eligibility period only in cases of disability. The bill I am introducing today will allow the VA Administrator to extend the 10-year period for veterans who are also military spouses living with their husbands or wives and who are unable to pursue their chosen educational program because of where they live.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the costs of this bill would be insignificant. A relatively small number of people would be eligible for the extension for which the bill provides. But for those who would be affected, this bill will have a very significant impact. These veterans have served their country as members of the armed forces, and, in a sense, they continue to serve their country as military spouses. This legislation would help to ensure that they are not denied the opportunity to achieve their educational goals.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1646

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Represenatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1662 of title 38, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (f); and

(2) by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection (e):

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, if—

"(A) an eligible veteran was last discharged or released from active duty on or after January 1, 1970,

"(B) the Administrator determines that, during the entire 10-year period applicable to the eligible veteran under such subsection—

"(i) the eligible veteran was married to a member of the Armed Forces and resided with the member at or near each permanent duty station to which the member was assigned during such period, and

"(ii) the eligible veteran was unable to pursue a program of education appropriate for the educational, professional, or vocational objective chosen by the eligible veteran because the veteran's residences were not within a reasonable commuting distance of an educational institution or training establishment (approved in accordance with chapter 36 of this title) offering such a program of education, and

"(C) the eligible veteran satisfies the application requirements prescribed in paragraph (2) of this subsection, educational assistance may be afforded the eligible veteran under this chapter during the 4-year period beginning on the date the Administrator approves an application filed by the veteran as required under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) An eligible veteran described in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall submit to the Administrator an application under section 1671 of this title within one year after the earlier of—

"(A) the first date the veteran's spouse is assigned to a permanent duty station in the Armed Forces which is within a reasonable commuting distance of an educational institution or training establishment referred to in paragraph (1)(B)(ii) of this subsection;

"(B) the date the veteran's spouse is discharged or released from active duty;

"(C) the date the veteran begins to reside in a location which is within a reasonable commuting distance of an educational institution or training establishment referred to in paragraph (1)(B)(ii) of this subsection; or

"(D) the date the marriage to the veteran's spouse terminates.

An eligible veteran shall include with the application submitted under section 1671 of this title such additional information and documentation as the Administrator requires for the purpose of making determinations under paragraph (1) of this subsection.".

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 1662(e)(2) of title 38, United States Code (as added by the first section), shall not apply in the case of any eligible veteran (as defined in section 1652(a)(1) of such title) who submits an application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under section 1671 of such title within 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself and Mr. ROTH):

S. 1647. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to enhance the protection of intellectual property rights; to the Committee on Finance.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Amendments of 1985, a bill to strengthen the enforcement of patents, copyrights, and trademarks in international trade. I am pleased to be joined by my distinguished colleague from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

As the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness recently confirmed, America has no greater economic advantage than its technology and innovation. Yet, we will not reap the economic benefits of that technology unless we maintain an effective system for the protection of intellectual property rights, that is, patents, copyrights, and trademarks.

Developing new technology and innovation takes time, money and risk. The inventor needs an opportunity to reap a return, and our economy needs the opportunity to exploit American innovation.

Unfortunately, with increasing frequency, foreign firms are pirating American inventions, and then shipping those products back to the United States. The International Trade Commission estimated, back in 1982, that infringement of U.S. intellectual property cost Americans 131,000 jobs, in just five selected industrial sectors, and cost the Nation's businesses $5.5 billion in annual sales.

Since then, the problem has gotten worse. Piracy occurs in items as diverse as toy gremlins, optical waveguide fiber and amorphous metals.

One remedy is provided by section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930. It gives the International Trade Commission the general power to exclude imports when the importer engages in "unfair methods of competition or unfair acts." The law has been used to keep out pirated products, but the law needs to be strengthened, and that is what our legislation would do.

Because the law was not designed specifically to protect intellectual property rights, it requires a complaining party to show that the imports threaten an efficient and economically operated domestic industry with destruction or substantial injury. Only then, can relief be granted.

Where trade affects the rights of patent, copyright, or trademark owners in the United States, there ought not be such obstacles to relief. To exclude certain imported goods, it should be enough that the articles infringe a patent, or are made abroad by the unauthorized use of a process that is patented here.

It should be enough that the imported article infringes a copyright, or that a product covered by a trademark was manufactured without the authority of the trademark holder. In other words, the bill covers the case of counterfeit trademarks. Much more controversial, and not addressed here, is the case in which products have bona fide trademarks, but enter through so-called gray market channels.

Intellectual property owners covered by the bill need not prove that a whole industry is threatened with destruction or substantial injury. Infringement is sufficient injury.

Also, an inventor would not have to prove that its industry is efficiently and economically operated. Indeed, some small high technology firms may not have the chance to get started, and to become economical, before they are challenged by pirates.

The bill would make additional changes in section 337. It would require the ITC to act promptly on requests for relief pending the final resolution of a complaint. In cases where a key shipment of infringing goods is on its way, or a critical selling season is approaching, the failure of the ITC to act promptly inflicts harm on the intellectual property owners that is not easily remedied.

In order to overcome reluctance in the granting of temporary exclusion orders, the ITC is given the discretion to require the party seeking the order to put up a bond.

The bill also confirms the principle of finality of ITC judgments. There are cases, for example, where a party that is subject to an exclusion order for infringing a patent comes forth seeking a determination that it no longer infringes or seeks a modification of the order. The intellectual property owner is faced with additional litigation, to preserve the rights it so recently enforced.

The bill would confirm that the burden of proof in this subsequent proceeding is clearly on the party that was found in violation of the law. That party should be estopped from raising claims that could have been raised in the previous proceeding. It is my understanding that this is the rule today, but, the bill would enact this rule into statute.

The legislation also grants the ITC the power to order the forfeiture of articles. In principle, a general exclusion order is a powerful remedy, blocking the entry of goods, and forcing their return.

In reality, I am afraid, the Customs Service simply cannot and does not catch all infringing goods. When it does stop articles, it orders only that they be returned, and risks that there will be a second effort to import the goods, an effort that may elude detection. Forfeiture would make sure that pirates and counterfeiters do not have a second chance.

The legislation also speeds the granting of limited exclusion orders where a respondent defaults. The ITC may be justified in its current practice of establishing an adequate basis for a general exclusion order, even where respondents default, because of the broad nature of the remedy. However, where a party seeks a limited exclusion order, and a party defaults without good cause, relief should be forthcoming. Of course, securing a limited exclusion order when a party is in default should not preclude the complainant from securing a general exclusion order as well if a prima facie case is made.

Last, the bill increases the penalties for violation of cease and desist orders.

Mr. President, I should note that recently I joined Senator MATHIAS in introducing S. 1543, the Process Patent Amendment of 1985. Senator ROTH is also a cosponsor of that bill. It would make it a violation of domestic patent law to import, use or sell a product that is made abroad through the unauthorized use of a process that is patented here. Process patent reform is needed, to bring our law into line with that of other major industrial powers. It is needed to ensure the protection of our innovations, and the maintenance of incentives to innovate.

The bill we introduce today is a complement, and certainly not a substitute, for process patent law reform. The bill is a reflection of the breadth of the problem posed by the infringement of intellectual property rights, and the need for a variety of solutions.

Indeed, perhaps the greatest policymaking challenge is to increase respect of intellectual property in other nations, and in trade that does not involve the United States. When an American inventor's product is knocked off in one foreign country, and sold in another, U.S. exports are hurt.

We can condition certain trade benefits on adequate and effective intellectual property right protection. That was a provision of my bill last Congress, S. 2549, a provision that also found its way into the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984. But that approach depends on vigorous enforcement by an administration that may, unfortunately, be diverted by the pursuit of competing policy goals as well. In other words, Mr. President, a great deal of work needs to be done to raise international standards of intellectual property right protection.

I am not aware of any Member of this body who is not distressed by the flood of imports that have tipped our balance of trade. The causes of our trade imbalance are complex. Crafting a solution is not easy.

But, when the imports are pirated versions of American inventions, as is too often the case, there is no question that we should act and act firmly.

The legislation we introduce today will take action against unfair trade in counterfeit goods, pirated inventions, and copied works. I urge my colleagues to support this important amendment to our trade law.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1647

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) Subsection (a) of section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337), is amended—

(1) by striking out "(a) Unfair" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a)(1) Unfair",

(2) by striking out "efficiently and economically operated",

(3) by striking out "prevent" and inserting in lieu thereof "impair or prevent", and

(4) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) For purposes of this section, the following acts in the importation of articles into the United States or in their sale are declared to be unfair and to have the effect or tendency to destroy or substantially injure an industry or to impair the establishment of an industry;

"(A) Unauthorized importation of an article which infringes a valid United States patent or the unauthorized sale of such an imported article.

"(B) Unauthorized importation of an article which—

"(i) was made, produced, processed, or mined under, or by means of, a process covered by a valid United States patent, and

"(ii) if made, produced, processed, or mined in the United States, would infringe a valid United States patent, or the unauthorized sale of such an imported article.

"(C) Unauthorized importation of an article which infringes a valid United States copyright or the unauthorized sale of such an imported article.

"(D) Importation of an article which infringes a valid United States trademark, or the sale of such an imported article, if the manufacture or production of such imported article was unauthorized.".

(b) Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337) is amended—

(1) by striking out "subsection (d) or (e)" in subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (d), (e), (f), or (g)",

(2) by striking out "subsection (d), (e), or (f)" in subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h)",

(4) by striking out "If" in the first sentence of subsection (e) and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) If",

(5) by adding at the end of subsection (e) the following new paragraph:

"(2) Any person may petition the Commission for the issuance of an order under this subsection. The Commission shall make a determination with regard to such petition by no later than the date that is 90 days after the date on which such petition is filed with the Commission. The Commission may require the petitioner to post a bond as a prerequisite to the issuance of an order under this subsection.",

(6) by striking out "In lieu of" in subsection (f)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "In addition to, or in lieu of,",

(7) by inserting "twice" after "of $10,000 or" in subsection (f)(2),

(8) by redesignating subsections (g), (h), (i), and (j) as subsections (i), (j), (k), and (l), respectively,

(9) by inserting after subsection (f) the following new subsections:

"(g) FORFEITURE.—In addition to taking action under subsection (d) or (e), the Commission may issue an order providing that an article imported in violation of the provisions of this section be seized and forfeited to the United States. The Commission shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury of any order issued under this subsection and, upon receipt of such notice, the Secretary shall enforce such order in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

"(h) DEFAULT.—If—

"(1) a complaint is filed against a person under this section,

"(2) such complaint and a notice of investigation are served on such person,

"(3) such person fails to respond to the complaint and notice or otherwise fails to appear to answer the complaint and notice,

"(4) such person fails to show good cause why such person should not be found in default,

"(5) the facts alleged in the petition establish a violation of the provisions of this section, and

(6) the complainant seeks relief affecting such person,

the Commission shall presume the facts alleged in the complaint and shall, upon request, issue relief under this section affecting solely such person, unless, after considering the effect of such an order of relief upon the public health and welfare, competitive conditions in the United States economy, the production of like or directly competitive articles in the United States, and United States consumers, the Commission finds that such an order of relief should not be issued.",

(10) by striking out "subsection (d), (e), or (f)" each place it appears in subsection (i), as redesignated by paragraph (8) of this subsection, and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h)",

(11) by inserting "and no seizure shall be made of any article under subsection (g) until such determination becomes final if such bond is posted" after "becomes final" in subsection (i)(3), as so redesignated,

(12) by striking out "and (g)" in subsection (j), as so redesignated, and inserting in lieu thereof "and (i)",

(13) by striking out "notifies" in subsection (j), as so redesignated, and inserting in lieu thereof ", or order to seize, notifies",

(14) by striking out "Except" in subsection (j), as so redesignated, and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) Except",

(15) by adding at the end of subsection (j), as so redesignated, the following new paragraph:

"(2) If any person who has previously been found by the Commission to be in violation of this section petitions the Commission for a determination that the petitioner is no longer in violation of this section or for a modification or recision of an order under subsection (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h)—

"(A) the burden of proof in any proceeding before the Commission regarding such petition shall be on the petitioner, and

"(B) relief may be granted by the Commission with respect to such petition only on the basis of new evidence or evidence that could not have been presented at the prior proceeding.",

(16) by striking out "subsection (d), (e), or (f)" in subsection (k), as so redesignated, and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h)", and

(17) by striking out "patent" each place it appears in subsection (k) and inserting in lieu thereof "patent, copyright, or trademark".

SEC. 3. The Act of July 2, 1940 (54 Stat. 724, chapter 515; 19 U.S.C. 1337a) is hereby repealed.●

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I join Mr. LAUTENBERG in introducing legislation which is designed to level the playing field with respect to the enforcement of U.S. intellectual property rights. As our economy and the international competitiveness of our industries become increasingly dependent upon U.S. ingenuity and technological innovation, it has become critical to ensure quick, effective, and meaningful protection for U.S. intellectual property, both at home and abroad. While it is becoming increasingly important to seek the recognition and enforcement of intellectual property rights by all nations, all such efforts must begin at home. Currently, it is more difficult for the U.S. owner of a U.S. patent, copyright, or trademark to secure relief against infringing imports than it is to secure relief against infringing products made in the United States. Although the laws were not intended to have this result, that is currently the effect.

Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 has become one of the primary mechanisms for enforcing U.S. intellectual property rights against infringing imports, because it is frequently the only means of securing effective relief against infringing merchandise of foreign origin. However, because section 337 was originally designed to cover a broad range of unfair acts in the importation of goods into the United States, it contains several elements, in addition to an unfair act, which must be proven before relief will be issued. Many of these requirements make no sense in the context of the infringement of intellectual property. Moreover, these elements are not required by our international obligations, as evidenced by the fact that many of our trading partners do not require such showings for the exclusion of infringing imports.

In order to secure relief against infringing imports, the owner of U.S. intellectual property must prove, in addition to infringement: (a) The presence of a U.S. industry, (b) that the U.S. industry is efficiently and economically operated, (c) that the effect or tendency of the infringing imports is to destroy or substantially injure a U.S. industry, and (d) that the beneficial effect of the contemplated relief outweighs certain public interest considerations enumerated in the statute.

The bill which I propose today is designed to require that foreign companies seeking the benefits and profits of the U.S. market play by the same set of rules that our U.S. companies must observe.

The bill provides that injury under section 337 has been shown where a complainant has successfully shown infringement of a U.S. patent, copyright, or trademark—or the importation or sale of products made by a process which would infringe a U.S. process patent, if practiced in the United States.

The bill also contains several other amendments designed to make section 337 relief more meaningful to holders of U.S. intellectual property. First, the U.S. International Trade Commission [ITC], the agency responsible for administering the statute, is authorized to require that a complainant seeking a temporary exclusion order post a bond in the event that the complainant is not successful. This provision is intended to make it easier for the ITC to provide temporary relief when needed.

Second, the bill would require the ITC to act on requests for temporary relief within 90 days after a petition for such relief is filed. In cases involving seasonal markets, or where key shipments of infringing merchandise are pending, temporary relief should be used to prevent harm to the owners of the intellectual property in issue.

Third, the bill provides the ITC with greater flexibility in designing relief. The bill would allow the ITC to issue cease and desist orders in addition to exclusion orders, rather than in lieu of exclusion orders. The bill would also grant the ITC the authority to order forfeiture of merchandise found to be in violation of section 337. This would prevent harm to an intellectual property owner where goods have been imported during an investigation, or during the Presidential review period. The loss of a bond to the U.S. Government penalizes the importer, but provides no relief to the U.S. intellectual property owner if the goods are imported while under bond.

Fourth, the bill underscores the importance of the finality of ITC judgments, by providing that a party that has been found to be in violation of section 337 may seek an advisory opinion or modification of the order, only if the party first shows that it is presenting new evidence or evidence that could not have been presented during the course of the original investigation. It also codifies the requirement that a party seeking such action has the burden of proving that the product or process would not violate section 337.

A complainant that has successfully shown that a patent is valid and infringed should not, in the absence of a showing of good cause, be subject to the expense of additional proceedings to protect the value of the relief secured. This is the approach which the ITC has adopted in the past. This bill would strengthen those principles and enact such requirements into the statute.

Fifth, the bill provides that a complainant need not go to the expense of establishing a prima facie case in an administrative hearing, if the respondent or respondents are in default, and the complainant is seeking relief against only the defaulting parties.

Lastly, the bill increases the penalties for violation of cease and desist orders.

The Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement Amendments of 1985 is intended to be a complement, rather than a substitute for, legislation strengthening U.S. process patent laws.

In today's highly competitive international marketplace, we can no longer afford to pioneer new technology after new technology, while complacently allowing others to profit from the resources and efforts required for developing such innovation. This bill represents an important step in remedying this problem.●

By Mr. MURKOWSKI:

S.J. Res. 199. A joint resolution to designate the month of November 1985 as "National Elks Veterans Remembrance Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ELKS VETERANS REMEMBRANCE MONTH

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I rise to introduce a resolution to designate the month of November as "National Elks Veterans Remembrance Month."

There are over 1,650,000 members of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks assembled in 50 State groups. The Elks, founded in 1868, have always demonstrated a strong commitment to this Nation's veterans.

During their 1946 convention, the Elks National Service Commission made a solemn pledge, "So long as there are veterans in our hospitals, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks will never forget them." Today, the Elks and their ladies auxiliaries continue to honor that pledge, as they provide many services and programs to hospitalized veterans.

The Elks National Service Commission supervises activities in all 172 Veterans' Administration Medical Centers and nursing homes and domiciliaries. In addition to providing entertainment, occupational therapy assistance, and comfort to hospitalized veterans, the Elks have given financial support to hospital committees. For example, the Elks through hide gathering programs, donate tanned hides to the VA, the market value being in excess of $1 million annually.

In 1919, the Elks funded and built a 700-bed reconstruction hospital in Boston to receive wounded servicemen returning home after World War I. The hospital was donated to the Government and became a veterans' hospital.

During World War II, Elks lodges helped recruit aviation cadets and conducted courses that enabled thousands of men to qualify for flight training. When the Army needed help to recruit 45,000 men for Air Corps ground crews, the Elks recruited 97,000 men. The Elks have also been successful in recruitment drives for the Navy and for enlisting nurses for Veterans' Administration hospitals.

The Elks have recently gone nationwide with their "Adopt a Veteran Program." This program seeks volunteers to tend to hospitalized veterans who are without family or friends nearby. The volunteer makes regular visits, providing personal care items, letter writing, phone calls and in general tending to the veteran's needs in areas where the Government cannot. Last year, Elks "adopted" more than 15,000 veterans.

In recognition of the many services the Elks have rendered to this Nation's veterans, it seems fitting to designate the month of November as "National Elks Veterans Remembrance Month."

Given the spirit of volunteerism that has been sweeping across America in recent years—with much credit to the current Administration's Private Sector Initiatives Program—it is appropriate that we recognize one of this Nation's premier volunteer organizations. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort, to say thank you to this fine organization, not only for the work they have done for veterans, but for the spirit they infused in America.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was orderd to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 199

Whereas there are one million, six hundred and fifty thousand members of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, assembled in fifty State groups;

Whereas the fraternal and benevolent society, founded in 1868, has demonstrated a strong commitment to the veterans of the Nation;

Whereas the pledge of the Elks National Service Commission first made in 1946, remains, "so long as there are veterans in our hospitals, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks will never forget them.";

Whereas the Elks and the Ladies Auxiliaries of the Elks provide many services and programs to hospitalized veterans;

Whereas the Elks National Service Commission provides volunteer services and assistance in all one hundred and seventy-two Veterans' Administration medical centers, and nursing homes and domiciliaries;

Whereas in addition to providing entertainment, occupational therapy assistance, and comfort to hospitalized veterans, the Elks have given financial support to hospital committees and have engaged in recruitment activities for the Armed Services;

Whereas the numerous contributions of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks on behalf of the veterans of the National deserve greater public recognition and awareness; and

Whereas recognition of the Elks by the Congress and President through enactment of legislation declaring the month of November 1985 as "National Elks Veterans Remembrance Month", would serve to create greater public recognition and awareness of the contributions of the fraternal society, to express the appreciation of the Nation for the service of the Elks, to inspire more responsive care to veterans of the Nation, and to reinforce that duty to American veterans is the responsibility of all: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of November 1985 is designated as "National Elks Veterans Remembrance Month", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all citizens, community leaders, interested organizations, and Government officials to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 64—RELATING TO A NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE FARM CREDIT SYSTEM

Mr. ABDNOR submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

S. CON. RES. 64

Whereas American agriculture remains in a severe economic recession;

Whereas this recession has jeopardized the financial condition of both lenders and borrowers of credit;

Whereas the Farm Credit System is a lender of one-third of the credit needs of American agriculture; and

Whereas investor confidence in the Farm Credit System securities is being eroded: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the President should, as soon as possible, form a non-partisan National Commission on the Farm Credit System to recommend reforms which will address the issues of ensuring adequate credit supplies and fair interest rates to farmers and ranchers,

(2) such Commission should transmit its recommendations to the President and the Congress within three weeks from the date of the passage of this resolution and thereafter at such times as the Commission deems appropriate, and

(3) such Commission should be composed of the Chairman or his selected representative of the House Committee on Agriculture, the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, and the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs; the Secretaries of Agriculture and Treasury or their representatives; the Chairman, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System or his representatives; the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration or his designee; one representative of each of the American Bankers Association and the Independent Bankers Association; one representative from a local entity within the Farm Credit System, and such other representative in the field of agricultural finance as the President deems appropriate to name. Such Commission shall not exceed twelve (12) persons.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I rise to submit a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should form a National Commission on the Farm Credit System. This Commission would provide recommendations to the Congress within 3 weeks concerning necessary reforms to the farm credit system to ensure adequate credit supplies and fair interest rates to farmers and ranchers.

It is essential, Mr. President, that we rapidly bring together the best and most informed minds in the country to address this farm credit crisis. Prices are down, exports are down, land values are down, farm income is down, and now the farmers' and ranchers' primary source of financing is on the brink of collapse. Not since the Great Depression have American farmers and ranchers more needed or deserved the attention and understanding of their representative Government.

This is not a partisan issue, Mr. President. Without credit, farmers will simply be unable to put in next year's crop and that will yield an immeasurable tragedy for this Nation and millions of others in foreign countries dependent upon the United States as a supplier of food.

Let's get on with the job—now.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

IMMIGRATION CONTROL ACT

HEINZ (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 602

Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ADBNOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. DENTON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. WILSON) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 600 proposed by Mrs. HAWKINS to the bill (S. 1200) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to effectively control unauthorized immigration to the United States, and for other purposes; as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

SEC. . POLICY TOWARD SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) public confidence in the Social Security system has been undermined by the acrimonious debates over deficit reduction;

(2) including Social Security Trust Funds in the Unified Federal Budget masks the true size of the federal deficit;

(3) Social Security is wholly funded by a separate payroll tax, is running a surplus, and does not contribute to the federal deficit;

(4) it is time to protect the integrity of both the Social Security program and the federal budget process by separating the two; and

(5) removing Social Security Trust Funds from the Unified Federal Budget will enable Congress to proceed with the responsibility of solving our massive budget deficit.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Senate that Congress should separate the Social Security Trust Funds from the Unified Federal Budget at the earliest possible date.

KENNEDY AMENDMENT NO. 603

Mr. KENNEDY proposed an amendment to amendment No. 600 proposed by Mrs HAWKINS to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

At the end of subsection (c) of the amendment, add the following new paragraph:

(4) Such sums as may be necessary and authorized for the Immigration and Naturalization Services to carry out the purposes of the section.

KENNEDY (AND BINGAMAN) AMENDMENT NO. 604

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 118, line 14, strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "three".

On page 119, line 11, strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "three".

On page 121, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

(d) TERMINATION DATE FOR EMPLOYER SANCTIONS.—(1) The provisions of section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall terminate 30 calendar days after receipt of the last report required to be transmitted under subsection (b), if—

(A) the Comptroller General determines, and so reports in such report, that a widespread pattern of discrimination has resulted against citizens or nationals of the United States or against eligible workers seeking employment, the sole result of the implementation of employer sanctions; and

(B) there is enacted, within such period of 30 calendar days, a joint resolution stating in substance that the Congress approves the findings of the Comptroller General contained in such report.

(2) Any joint resolution referred to in clause (B) of paragraph (1) shall be considered in the Senate in accordance with subsection (f).

(e) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—For the purpose of expediting the consideration and adoption of joint resolutions under subsection (d), a motion to proceed to the consideration of any such joint resolution after it has been reported by the appropriate committee shall be treated as highly privileged in the House of Representatives.

(f) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES IN THE SENATE.—(1) For purposes of subsection (d), the continuity of a session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the period indicated.

(2) Paragraphs (3) and (4) of this subsection are enacted—

(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and as such they are deemed a part of the rules of the Senate, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in the Senate in the case of joint resolutions referred to in subsection (d), and supersede other rules of the Senate only to the extent that such paragraphs are inconsistent therewith; and

(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of the Senate to change such rules at any time, in the same manner as in the case of any other rule of the Senate.

(3)(A) If the committee of the Senate to which has been referred a joint resolution relating to the report described in subsection (d) has not reported such joint resolution at the end of ten calendar days after its introduction, not counting any day which is excluded under paragraph (1) of this subsection, it is in order to move either to discharge the committee from further consideration of the joint resolution or to discharge the committee from further consideration of any other joint resolution introduced with respect to the same report which has been referred to the committee, except that no motion to discharge shall be in order after the committee has reported a joint resolution with respect to the same report.

(B) A motion to discharge under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph may be made only by a Senator favoring the joint resolution, is privileged, and debate thereon shall be limited to not more than 1 hour, to be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the joint resolution, the time to be divided equally between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees. An amendment to the motion is not in order, and it is not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(4)(A) A motion in the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution shall be privileged. An amendment to the motion shall not be in order, nor shall it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(B) Debate in the Senate on a joint resolution, and all debatable motions and appeals in connection therewith, shall be limited to not more than 10 hours, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees.

(C) Debate in the Senate on any debatable motion or appeal in connection with a joint resolution shall be limited to not more than 1 hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the joint resolution, except that in the event the manager of the joint resolution is in favor of any such motion or appeal, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from time under their control on the passage of a joint resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any debatable motion or appeal.

(D) A motion in the Senate to further limit debate on a joint resolution, debatable motion, or appeal is not debatable. No amendment to, or motion to recommit, a joint resolution is in order in the Senate.

KENNEDY (AND BINGAMAN) AMENDMENT NO. 605

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

Beginning on page 68 with line 7, strike out all through line 7 on page 93 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE II—LEGALIZATION

LEGALIZATION

SEC. 201. (a) Chapter 5 of title II is amended by inserting after section 245 (8 U.S.C. 1255) the following new section:

"ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF CERTAIN ENTRANTS BEFORE JANUARY 1, 1981, TO THAT OF PERSONS ADMITTED FOR TEMPORARY OR PERMANENT RESIDENCE

"SEC. 245A. (a) The Attorney General may, in his discretion and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, adjust the status of an alien to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if—

"(1) the alien applies for such adjustment during the twelve-month period beginning on a date (not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this section) designated by the Attorney General,

"(2)(A) the alien (other than an alien who entered as a nonimmigrant) establishes that he entered the United States prior to January 1, 1977, and has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1977, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, or

"(B) the alien entered the United States as a nonimmigrant before January 1, 1977, the alien's period of authorized stay as a nonimmigrant expired before January 1, 1977, through the passage of time or the alien's unlawful status was known to the Government as of January 1, 1977, and the alien has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1977, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, and

"(C) if the alien was at any time a nonimmigrant exchange alien (as defined in section 101(a)(15)(J)), the alien was not subject to the two-year foreign residence requirement of section 212(e) or has fulfilled that requirement or received a waiver thereof;

"(3) the alien was continuously physically present in the United States since the date of the enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(4) the alien—

"(A) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3),

"(B) has not been convicted of any felony or of three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States,

"(C) has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, and

"(D) registers under the Military Selective Service Act, if the alien is required to be so registered under that Act.

Notwithstanding paragraph (1), an alien who (at any time during the one-year period described in paragraph (1)) is the subject of an order to show cause issued under section 242, must make application under such paragraph not later than the end of the thirty-day period beginning either on the first day of such one-year period or on the date of the issuance of such order, whichever day is later. An alien shall not be considered to have failed to maintain continuous physical presence in the United States for purposes of paragraph (3) by virtue of a brief, casual, and innocent absence from the United States.

"(b)(1) The Attorney General may, in his discretion and under such regulations as he shall prescribe, adjust the status of an alien to that of an alien lawfully admitted for temporary residence if—

"(A) the alien applies for such adjustment during the twelve-month period described in subsection (a)(1);

"(B)(i) the alien (other than an alien who entered as a nonimmigrant) establishes that he entered the United States prior to January 1, 1981, and has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1981, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; or

"(ii) the alien entered the United States as a nonimmigrant before January 1, 1981, the alien's period of authorized stay as a nonimmigrant expired before January 1, 1981, through the passage of time or the alien's unlawful status was known to the Government as of January 1, 1981, and the alien has resided continuously in the United States in an unlawful status from January 1, 1981, through the date of enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(iii) if the alien was at any time a nonimmigrant exchange alien (as defined in section 101(a)(15)(J)), the alien was not subject to the two-year foreign residence requirement of section 212(e) or has fulfilled that requirement or received a waiver thereof;

"(C) the alien has been continuously physically present in the United States since the date of the enactment of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985; and

"(D) the alien—

"(i) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3),

"(ii) has not been convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States,

"(iii) has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, and

"(iv) registers under the Military Selective Service Act, if the alien is required to be so registered under that Act.

For purposes of this subsection, an alien in the status of a Cuban and Haitian entrant described in paragraph (1) or (2)(A) of section 501(e) of Public Law 96-422 shall be considered to have entered the United States and to be in an unlawful status in the United States. Notwithstanding paragraph (1), an alien who (at any time during the one-year period described in subparagraph (A)) is the subject of an order to show cause issued under section 242, must make application under such paragraph not later than the end of the thirty-day period beginning either on the first day of such one-year period or on the date of the issuance of such order, whichever day is later. An alien shall not be considered to have failed to maintained continuous physical presence in the United States for purposes of subparagraph (C) by virtue of a brief, casual, and innocent absence from the United States.

"(2) During the period an alien is in the lawful temporary resident status granted under paragraph (1)—

"(A) the Attorney General shall, in accordance with regulations, permit the alien to return to the United States after such brief and casual trips abroad as reflect an intention on the part of the alien to adjust to lawful permanent resident status under paragraph (1) and after brief temporary trips abroad occasioned by a family obligation involving an occurrence such as the illness or death of a close relative or other family need, and

"(B) the Attorney General shall grant the alien authorization to engage in employment in the United States and provide to that alien an 'employment authorized' endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(3) The Attorney General, in his discretion and under such regulations as he may prescribe, may adjust the status of any alien provided lawful temporary resident status under paragraph (1) to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if the alien—

"(A) applies for such adjustment during the 12-month period beginning with the first day of the twenty-fifth month that begins after the date the alien was granted such temporary resident status;

"(B) establishes that he has continuously resided in the United States since the date the alien was granted such temporary resident status;

"(C)(i) is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3), and

"(ii) has not been convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States; and

"(D) can demonstrate that he either (i) meets the requirements of section 312 (relating to minimal understanding of ordinary English and a knowledge and understanding of the history and government of the United States), or (ii) is satisfactorily pursuing a course of study (recognized by the Attorney General) to achieve such an understanding of English and such a knowledge and understanding of the history and government of the United States. An alien shall not be considered to have lost the continuous residence referred to in subparagraph (B) by reason of an absence from the United States permitted under paragraph (2)(A). The Attorney General may, in his discretion, waive all or part of the requirements of subparagraph (D) in the case of an alien who is 65 years of age or older.

"(4) The Attorney General shall provide for termination of temporary resident status granted an alien under this subsection—

"(A) if it appears to the Attorney General that the alien was in fact not eligible for such status,

"(B) if the alien commits an act that (i) makes the alien inadmissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as otherwise provided under subsection (c)(3), or (ii) is convicted of any felony or three or more misdemeanors committed in the United States, or

"(C) at the end of the thirty-seventh month beginning after the date the alien is granted such status, unless the alien has filed an application for adjustment of such status pursuant to paragraph (3) and such application has not been denied.

"(c)(1)(A) The Attorney General shall provide that applications for adjustment of status under subsection (a) or under subsection (b)(1) may be filed—

"(i) with the Attorney General, or

"(ii) with an organization or person designated under subparagraph (B), but only if the applicant consents to the forwarding of the application to the Attorney General.

"(B) For purposes of assisting in the program of legalization provided under this section, the Attorney General shall designate qualified voluntary organizations and other qualified State, local, and community organizations and may designate such other persons as the Attorney General determines are qualified and have substantial experience, demonstrated competence, and traditional long-term involvement in the preparation and submittal of applications for adjustment of status under Public law 89-732 or under Public Law 94-145.

"(C) Each organization or person designated under subparagraph (B) must agree to forward to the Attorney General applications filed with it in accordance with subparagraph (A)(ii) but not to forward to the Attorney General applications filed with it unless the applicant has consented to such forwarding. No such organization or person may make a determination required by this section to be made by the Attorney General.

"(D) Whoever files an application for adjustment of status under this section and knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals, or covers up a material fact or makes any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(E) The Attorney General shall provide for a schedule of fees to be charged for the filing of applications for adjustment under subsection (a) or under subsection (b)(1). The Attorney General shall deposit payments received under the preceding sentence in a separate account and amounts in such account shall be available, without fiscal year limitation, only to cover administrative expenses incurred in connection with the review of applications filed under this section.

"(2) The numerical limitations of sections 201 and 202 shall not apply to the adjustment of aliens to lawful permanent resident status under this section.

"(3) The provisions of paragraphs (14), (20), (21), (25), and (32) of section 212(a) shall not be applicable in the determination of an alien's admissibility under subsections (a)(4)(A), (b)(1)(D)(i), (b)(3)(C)(i), and (b)(4)(B)(i), and the Attorney General, in making such determination with respect to a particular alien, may waive any other provision of such section other than paragraph (9), (10), (15) (except as it applies to the adjustment to lawful temporary resident status under subsection (a)), (23) (except for so much of such paragraph as relates to a single offense of simple possession of thirty grams or less of marihuana), (27), (28), (29), or (33), for humanitarian purposes, to assure family unity, or when it is otherwise in the public interest. For purposes of this section, an alien is not ineligible for adjustment of status under this section due to being inadmissible under section 212(a)(15) if the alien demonstrates a history of employment in the United States evidencing self-support without receipt of public cash assistance.

"(4) During the six-month period beginning on the date of the enactment of this section, the Attorney General, in cooperation with qualified organizations and governments designated under paragraph (1) and the Secretary of Labor, shall broadly disseminate information respecting the benefits which aliens may receive under this section and the requirements to obtain such benefits.

"(5)(A) The Attorney General shall provide that in the case of an alien who is apprehended before the beginning of the application period described in subsection (a)(1) and who can establish a prima facie case of eligibility to have his status adjusted under subsection (a) or subsection (b)(1) (but for the fact that he may not apply for such adjustment until the beginning of such period), until the alien has had the opportunity during the first 30 days of the application period to complete the filing of an application for adjustment, the alien—

"(i) may not be deported, and

"(ii) shall be granted authorization to engage in employment in the United States and be provided an 'employment authorized" endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(B) The Attorney General shall provide that in the case of an alien who presents an application for adjustment of status under subsection (a) or subsection (b)(1) during such application period which application establishes a prima facie case of eligibility to have his status adjusted under such subsection, and until a final administrative determination on the application has been made in accordance with this section, the alien—

"(i) may not be deported, and

"(ii) shall be granted authorization to engage in employment in the United States and be provided an 'employment authorized' endorsement or other appropriate work permit.

"(6) Notwithstanding the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et. seq.), the Attorney General is hereby authorized to expend from the appropriation provided for the administration and enforcement of this Act, such amounts as may be necessary for the leasing or acquisition of property in the fulfillment of this section. This authority shall end two years after the date of the enactment of this Act.

"(d)(1) For the purposes of subsection (a), (b)(1), or (b)(3), an alien shall not be considered to have resided continuously in the United States, if, during any period for which continuous residence is required, the alien was outside the United States as a result of a departure under an order of deportation.

"(2) Any period of time during which an alien is outside the United States pursuant to the advance parole procedures of the Service shall not be considered as part of the period of time during which an alien is outside the United States for purposes of this section.

"(e)(1) During the five-year period beginning on the date an alien is granted lawful temporary resident status granted under subsection (b)(1) and during the three-year period beginning on the date an alien is granted lawful permanent resident status under subsection (2), and notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(A) except as provided in paragraph (2), the alien is not eligible for—

"(i) any program of financial assistance furnished under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government,

"(ii) medical assistance under a State plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act, and

"(iii) assistance under the Food Stamp Act of 1977, and

"(B) a State or political subdivision therein may, to the extent consistent with subparagraph (A), provide that the alien is not eligible for the programs of financial or medical assistance furnished under the law of that State or political subdivision.

Programs authorized under the National School Lunch Act, the Child Nutrition Act of 1966, the Vocational Education Act of 1963, chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981, the Headstart-Follow Through Act, the Job Training Partnership Act, and subparts 4 and 5 of part A of title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 shall not be construed to be programs of financial assistance referred to in subparagraph (A)(1). Programs authorized under the Public Health Service Act And title V of the Social Security Act shall not be construed to be programs of financial assistance refered to in subparagraph (A)(i).

"(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply—

"(A) to a Cuban and Haitian entrant (as defined in paragraph (1) of (2)(A) of section 501(e) of Public Law 96-422, as in effect on April 1, 1983);

"(B) in the case of assistance furnished to an alien who is an aged, blind, or disabled individual (as defined in section 1614(a)(1) of the Social Security Act), or

"(C) in the case of medical assistance (i) for care and services provided to an alien who is under 18 years of age, (ii) for emergency services (as defined for purposes of section 1916(a)(2)(D) of the Social Security Act) or (iii) for services described in section

1916(a)(2)(B) of such Act (relating to services for pregnant women).

The eligibility, comparability, and any other State plan requirements of title XIX of the Social Security Act are superseded to the extent required to restrict the medical assistance in the manner described in subparagraph (C) and paragraph (1)(A)(ii). The Secretary of Health and Human Services, in coordination with the Attorney General, shall promulgate regulations in order to carry out subparagraphs (B) and (C).

"(3) For the purpose of section 501 of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-122), assistance shall be continued under such section with respect to an alien without regard to the alien's adjustment of status under this section.

"(f)(1) The Attorney General, after consultation with the Committees on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and of the Senate and with organizations and persons designated under subsection (c)(1)(B), shall prescribe—

"(A) regulations establishing a definition of the term 'resided continuously', as used in this section, and the evidence needed to establish that an alien has resided continuously in the United States for purposes of this section, and

"(B) such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this section.

"(2) In prescribing regulations described in paragraph (1)(A), the Attorney General shall—

"(A) specify individual periods, and aggregate periods, of absence from the United States which will be considered to break a period of continuous residence in the United States and shall take into account absences due merely to brief and casual trips abroad;

"(B) provide for a waiver, in the discretion of the Attorney General, of the periods specified under subparagraph (A) in the case of an absence from the United States due merely to a brief temporary trip abroad required by emergency or extenuating circumstances outside the control of the alien;

"(C) require that continuous residence in the United States must be established through documents, together with independent corroboration of the information contained in such documents; and

"(D) require that the documents provided under subparagraph (C) be employment-related if employment-related documents with respect to the alien are available to the applicant.

"(3) Regulations prescribed under this section may be prescribed to take effect on an interim final basis if the Attorney General determines that this is necessary in order to implement this section in a timely manner.

"(g)(1) There shall be no administrative or judicial review of a determination respecting an application for adjustment of status under this section except in accordance with this subsection.

"(2) The Attorney General shall establish an appellate authority to provide for a single level of administrative appellate review of such a determination. Such administrative appellate review shall be based upon the administrative record established at the time of the determination on the application and upon such additional or newly discovered evidence as may not have been available at the time of the determination.

"(3)(A) There shall be no judicial review of such a determination, unless the applicant has exhausted the administrative review described in paragraph (2).

"(B) There shall be judicial review of such a denial only in the judicial review of an order of deportation under section 106. Such review shall be based solely upon the administrative record established at the time of the review by the appellate authority and the findings of fact and determinations contained in such record shall be conclusive.

"(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the retired or retainer pay of a member or former member of the Army Forces of the United States or the annuity of a retired employee of the Federal Government shall not be reduced while such individual is temporarily employed by the Service for a period of not to exceed fifteen months to perform duties in connection with the adjustment of status of aliens under this section.".

(b) The table of contents for chapter 5 of title II is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 245 the following new item:

"Sec. 245A. Adjustment of status of certain entrants before January 1, 1981, to that of persons admitted for temporary or permanent residence.".

(c) For reports on the legalization program provided under the amendment made by subsection (a), see section 405 of this Act.

CUBAN-HAITIAN ADJUSTMENT

SEC. 202. (a) The status of any alien described in subsection (b) may be adjusted by the Attorney General, in the Attorney General's discretion and under such regulations as the Attorney General may prescribe, to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if—

(1) the alien applies for such adjustment within two years after the date of the enactment of this Act;

(2) the alien is otherwise eligible to receive an immigrant visa and is otherwise admissible to the United States for permanent residence, except in determining such admissibility the grounds for exclusion specified in paragraphs (14), (15), (20), (21), (25), and (32) of section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall not apply;

(3) the alien is not an alien described in section 243(h)(2) of such Act;

(4) the alien is physically present in the United States on the date the application for such adjustment is filed; and

(5) the alien has continuously resided in the United States since January 1, 1982.

(b) The benefits provided by subsection (a) shall apply to any alien—

(1) who has received an immigration designation as a Cuban/Haitian Entrant (Status Pending) as of the date of the enactment of this Act, or

(2) who is a national of Cuba or Haiti, who arrived in the United States before January 1, 1982, with respect to whom any record was established by the Immigration and Naturalization Service before January 1, 1982, and who (unless the alien filed an application for asylum with the Immigration and Naturalization Service before January 1, 1982) was not admitted to the United States as a nonimmigrant.

(c) An alien who, as of the date of the enactment of this Act, is a Cuban and Haitian entrant for the purpose of section 501 of Public Law 96-422 shall continue to be considered such an entrant for such purpose without regard to any adjustment of status effected under this section.

(d) Upon approval of an alien's application for adjustment of status under subsection (a), the Attorney General shall establish a record of the alien's admission for permanent residence as of January 1, 1982.

(e) When an alien is granted the status of having been lawfully admitted for permanent residence pursuant to this section, the Secretary of State shall not be required to reduce the number of immigrant visas authorized to be issued under this Act and the Attorney General shall not be required to charge the alien any fee.

(f) Except as otherwise specifically provided in this section, the definitions contained in the Immigration and Nationality Act shall apply in the administration of this section. Nothing contained in this section shall be held to repeal, amend, alter, modify, effect, or restrict the powers, duties, functions, or authority of the Attorney General in the administration and enforcement of such Act or any other law relating to immigration, nationality, or naturalization. The fact that an alien may be eligible to be granted the status of having been lawfully admitted for permanent residence under this section shall not preclude the alien from seeking such status under any other provision of law for which the alien may be eligible.

STATE LEGALIZATION IMPACT-ASSISTANCE GRANTS

SEC. 203. (a)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated for grants (and related Federal administrative costs) to carry out this section $1,000,000,000 (less the amount described in paragraph (2)) for fiscal year 1986 and for each of the three succeeding fiscal years.

(2)(A) Subject to subparagraphs (B) and (C), the amount described in this paragraph for a fiscal year is equal to the amount estimated to be expended by the Federal Government in the fiscal year for the programs of financial assistance, medical assistance, and assistance under the Food Stamp Act of 1977 for aliens who would not be eligible for such assistance under paragraph (1)(A) of section 249A(e) of the Immigration and Nationality Act but for the provisions of subparagraphs (B) and (C) of paragraph (2) of such section.

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), with respect to—

(i) fiscal year 1986, the amount estimated to be expended is equal to $30,000,000, and

(ii) fiscal year 1987, the amount estimated to be expended is equal to $300,000,000. For subsequent fiscal years, the amount estimated to be expended shall be such estimate as contained in the annual fiscal budget submitted for that year to the Congress by the President.

HART (AND LEVIN) AMENDMENT NO. 606

Mr. HART (for himself and Mr. LEVIN) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 13, line 4, before the period insert "AND UNFAIR IMMIGRATION-RELATED EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES".

On page 13, line 7, strike out "section" and insert in lieu thereof "sections".

On page 33, line 12, strike out all that follows the first period.

On page 33, after line 12, insert the following:

"UNFAIR IMMIGRATION-RELATED EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

"SEC. 274B. (a) PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGIN OR IMMIGRATION STATUS.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—It is an unfair immigration-related employment practice for a person or other entity to engage in a pattern or practice of discrimination against individuals (other than unauthorized aliens, described in section 274A(h)(2)) with respect to the hiring, or recruitment or referral for a fee, of individuals for employment—

"(A) because of such individual's national origin, or

"(B) in the case of a citizen or intending citizen (as defined in paragraph (3)), because of their status as United States citizens, as aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence, as aliens admitted as refugees, as aliens granted asylum, or as aliens with lawful temporary resident status granted under section 202 of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to—

"(A) a person or other entity that employs three or fewer employees,

"(B) a person's or entity's discrimination because of an individual's national origin if the discrimination with respect to that person or entity and that individual is covered under section 703 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or

"(C) discrimination under paragraph (1)(B) which is otherwise required in order to comply with law, regulation, or executive order, or required by Federal, State, or local government contract, or which the Attorney General determines to be essential for an employer to do business with an agency or department of the Federal, State, or local government.

"(3) DEFINITION OF CITIZEN OR INTENDING CITIZEN.—As used in paragraph (1), the term citizen or intending citizen' means an individual who—

"(A) is a citizen or national of the United States, or

"(B) is an alien who—

"(i) is lawfully admitted for permanent residence, is admitted as a refugee under section 207, is granted asylum under section 208, or is granted lawful temporary resident status under section 202 of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, and

"(ii) evidences an intention to become a citizen of the United States through completing a declaration of intention to become a citizen;

but does not include an alien who fails to apply for naturalization within six months of the date the alien first becomes eligible (by virtue of period of lawful permanent residence) to apply for naturalization or, if later, within six months after the date of the enactment of this section.

"(b) COMPLAINTS OF VIOLATIONS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person alleging that the person is adversely affected directly by an unfair immigration-related employment practice or an officer of the Service alleging that an unfair immigration-related employment practice has occurred or is occurring may file a charge respecting such practice or violation with the Special Counsel (appointed under subsection (c)). Charges shall be in writing under oath or affirmation and shall contain such information as the Attorney General requires. The person filing a charge shall serve a notice of the charge (including the date, place, and circumstances of the alleged unfair immigration-related employment practice) on the person or entity involved within 10 days. The Special Counsel shall notify each complainant of the notice required under the previous sentence.

"(2) NO OVERLAP WITH EEOC COMPLAINTS.—No charge may be filed respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice described in subsection (a)(1)(A) if a charge with respect to that practice based on the same set of facts has been filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and no charge respecting an employment practice may be filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under such title if a charge with respect to such practice based on the same set of facts has been filed under this subsection. The previous sentence shall not apply where a charge has been mistakenly filed and has been withdrawn.

"(C) SPECIAL COUNSEL.—

"(1) APPOINTMENT.—The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Special Counsel for Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Special Counsel') within the Department of Justice, but outside the Immigration and Naturalization Service, to serve for a term of four years. In the case of a vacancy in the office of the Special Counsel the President may designate the officer or employee who shall act as Special Counsel during such vacancy.

"(2) DUTIES.—The Special Counsel shall be responsible for investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under this section and in respect of the prosecution of all such complaints before immigration judges and the exercise of certain functions under subsection (i)(1).

"(3) COMPENSATION.—The Special Counsel is entitled to receive compensation at the rate now or hereafter provided for grade GS-17 of the General Schedule, under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

"(4) REGIONAL OFFICES.—The Special Counsel, in accordance with regulations of the Attorney General, shall establish such regional offices as may be necessary to carry out his duties.

"(5) STAFFING OF OFFICE OF SPECIAL COUNSEL.—In providing staffing for the Special Counsel, the Attorney General shall take into consideration the volume of charges filed with the special Counsel under this section, as well as the complexity of those charges and the need for the conduct of investigations under the second sentence of subsection (d)(1).

"(d) INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINTS.—

"(1) BY SPECIAL COUNSEL.—The Special Counsel shall investigate each charge received and, within 90 days of the date of the receipt of the charge, determine whether or not there is reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true and whether or not to bring a complaint with respect to the charge before an administrative law judge. The Special Counsel may, on his own initiative, conduct investigations respecting unfair immigration-related employment practices and, based on such an investigation and subject to paragraph (3), file a compliant before such a judge.

"(2) PRIVATE ACTIONS WHERE A PATTERN OR PRACTICE VIOLATION.—If the Special Counsel, after receiving such a charge respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice which alleges a pattern or practice of discriminatory activity, has not filed a complaint before an immigration judge with respect to such charge within such 90-day period, the person making the charge may (subject to paragraph (3)) file a complaint directly before such a judge.

"(3) TIME LIMITATIONS ON COMPLAINTS.—No complaint may be filed respecting any unfair immigration-related employment practice occurring more than 180 days prior to the date of the filing of the charge with the Special Counsel and the service of a copy thereof upon the person or entity against whom such charge is made. This subparagraph shall not prevent the subsequent amending of a charge or complaint under subsection (e)(1).

"(e)HEARINGS.—

"(1) NOTICE.—Whenever a complaint is made that a person or entity has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, an immigration judge shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person or entity a copy of the complaint and a notice of hearing before the judge at a place therein fixed, not less than five days after the serving of the complaint. Any such complaint may be amended by the judge conducting the hearing in the judge's discretion at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon. The person or entity so complained of shall have the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint and to appear in person or otherwise and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint.

"(2) CONDUCT OF HEARINGS.—Hearings on complaints under this subsection shall be considered before immigration judges who are specially designated by the Attorney General as having special training respecting employment discrimination and, to the extent practicable, before such judges who only consider cases under this seciton.

"(3) COMPLAINANT AS PARTY.—Any person filing a charge with the Special Counsel respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice shall be considered a full party to any complaint before an immigration judge respecting such practice and any subsequent appeal respecting that complaint. In the discretion of the judge conducting the hearing, any other person may be allowed to intervene in the said proceeding and to present testimony.

"(f) TESTIMONY AND AUTHORITY OF HEARING OFFICERS.—

"(1) TESTIMONY.—The testimony taken by the immigration judge shall be reduced to writing. Thereafter, the judge, in his discretion, upon notice may provide for the taking of further testimony or hear argument.

"(2) AUTHORITY OF IMMIGRATION JUDGES.—In conducting investigations and hearings under this subsection and in accordance with regulations of the Attorney General, the Special Counsel and immigration judges shall have reasonable access to examine evidence of any person or entity being investigated. The immigration judges by subpena may compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence at any designated place or hearing. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena lawfully issued under this paragraph and upon application of the immigration judge, an appropriate district court of the United States may issue an order requiring compliance with such subpena and any failure to obey such order may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

"(g) DETERMINATIONS.—

"(1) ORDER.—The immigration judge shall issue and cause to be served on the parties to the proceeding an order.

"(2) ORDERS FINDING VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If, upon the preponderance of the testimony taken, an immigration judge determines that that any person or entity named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, then the judge shall state his findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person or entity an order which requires such person or entity to cease and desist from such unfair immigration-related employment practice.

"(B) CONTENTS OF ORDER.—Such an order also may require the person or entity—

"(i) to comply with the requirement of section 274A(b) with respect to individuals hired (or recruited or referred for employment for a fee) during a period of up to three years;

"(ii) to retain for the period referred to in clause (i) and only for purposes consistent with section 274A(b)(6), the name and address of each individual who applies, in person or in writing, for hiring for an existing position, or for recruiting or referring for a fee, for employment in the United States;

"(iii) to hire individuals directly and adversely affected, with or without back pay; and

"(iv)(I) except as provided in subclause (II), to pay a civil penalty of not more than $1,000 for each individual discriminated against, and

"(II) in the case of a person or entity previously subject to such an order, to pay a civil penalty of not more than $2,000 for each individual discriminated against.

"(C) LIMITATION ON BACK PAY REMEDY.—In providing a remedy under subparagraph (B)(iii), back pay liability shall not accrue from a date more than two years prior to the filing of a charge with an immigration judge. Interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the individual or individuals aggrieved against shall operate to reduce the back pay otherwise allowable under such paragraph. No order shall require the hiring of an individual as an employee or the payment to him of any back pay, if the individual was refused employment for any reason other than discrimination on account of national origin or citizenship status.

"(D) TREATMENT OF DISTINCT ENTITIES.—In applying this subsection in the case of a person or entity composed of distinct, physically separate subdivisions each of which provides separately for the hiring, recruiting, or referring for employment without reference to the practices of, or under the control of, or common control with, another subdivision, each such subdivision shall be considered a separate person or entity.

"(3) ORDERS NOT FINDING VIOLATIONS.—If upon the preponderance of the testimony taken an immigration judge determines that the person or entity named in the complaint has engaged or is engaging in any such unfair immigration-related employment practice, then the judge shall state his findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the complaint.

"(h) AWARDING OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.—In any complaint respecting an unfair immigration-related employment practice, an immigration judge, in the judge's discretion, may allow a prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee.

"(i) JUDICIAL REVIEW PROCEDURES.—

"(1) MODIFICATION OF FINDINGS OR ORDERS PRIOR TO FILING RECORD IN COURT.—Until the record in a case is filed in a court under this subsection, an immigration judge may at any time upon reasonable notice and in such manner as the judge deems proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in party, any finding or order made or issued by the judge.

"(2) PETITION TO COURT FOR ENFORCEMENT OF ORDER, PROCEEDINGS, REVIEW OF JUDGMENT.—The Special Counsel may petition any court of appeals of the United States, or if all the courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States, within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for the enforcement of the order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall file in the court the record in the proceedings, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceedings and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the immigration judge. No objection that has not been urged before the judge shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the judge with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the judge, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the judge and to be made a part of the record. The immigration judge may modify his findings as to the facts, or make new findings by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and the judge shall file such modified or new findings, which findings with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive, and shall file his recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. Upon the filing of the record with it the jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate United States court of appeals if application was made to the district court, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

"(3) REVIEW OF FINAL ORDER ON PETITION TO COURT.—Any person aggrieved by a final order of an immigration judge under this section granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any United States court of appeals in the circuit wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such a court a written petition praying that the order of the immigration judge be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the immigration judge, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court the record in the proceeding, certified by the judge, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Special Counsel under paragraph (2), and shall have the same jurisidiction to grant to the aggrieved party such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the judge, the findings of the judge with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall in like manner be conclusive.

"(4) INSTITUTION OF COURT PROCEEDINGS AS STAY OF JUDGE'S ORDER.—The commencement of proceedings under this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the immigration judge's order.

"(5) INJUNCTIONS.—The Special Counsel may, upon issuance of a compaint under this section charging that a person has engaged or is engaging in an unfair immigration-related employment practice, to petition any United States district court, within any district wherein the unfair immigration-related employment practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon such have jurisdiction to grant to the Special Counsel such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

"(6) AWARDING OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.—In any proceeding under this subsection, the court, in its discretion, may allow a prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of costs.".

McCLURE (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 607

Mr. McCLURE (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. BINGAMAN) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 116, between lines 16 and 17, insert the following:

SEC. 304. POWERS OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Section 287 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1357) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section (other than paragraph (3) of subsection (a)), in the enforcement of this act an officer or employee or the Service may not enter onto the premises of a farm or other agricultural operation without a properly executed warrant."

CRANSTON AMENDMENT NO. 608

Mr. CRANSTON proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 89, line 15, before the period insert the following: "or, such documents provided under clause (i) may include a rent receipt, bank book, utility bill, or an affidavit from a credible witness (such as a parish priest)".

CHILES AMENDMENT NO. 609

Mr. CHILES proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 38, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(g)(1) The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Health and Human Services, shall conduct a study for use by the Department of Justice in determining employment eligibility in the United States. Such study shall concentrate on those data bases that are currently available to the Federal government which through the use of a telephone and computation capability could be used to verify instantly the employment eligibility status of job applicants.

(2) Such study shall be conducted in conjunction with any existing Federal program which is designed for the purpose of providing information on the resident or employment status of workers for employers. The study shall include an analysis of costs and benefits which shows the differences in costs and efficiency of having the Federal government or a contractor perform this service. Such comparisons should include reference to such technical capabilities as processing techniques and time, verification techniques and time, back up safeguards, and audit trail performance.

(3) Such study shall also concentrate on methods of phone verification which demonstrate the best safety and service standards, the least burden for the employer, the best capability for effective enforcement, and procedures which are within the boundaries of the Privacy Act of 1974.

(4) Such study shall be conducted within 12 months of the date of enactment of this Act.

(5) The Attorney General shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report—

(A) not later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act, describing the status of such study; and

(B) not later than twelve months after such date, setting forth the findings of such study.

MOYNIHAN (AND D'AMATO) AMENDMENT NO. 610

Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. D'AMATO) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 38, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(g)(1) The Comptroller General of the United States, upon consultation with the Commissioner of Immigration as well as private sector representatives (including representatives of the financial, banking, and manufacturing industries), shall inquire into technological alternatives for producing and issuing social security account number cards that are more resistant to counterfeiting than social security account number cards being issued on the date of enactment of this Act by the Social Security Administration, including the use of encoded magnetic, optical, or active electronic media such as magnetic stripes, holograms, and integrated circuit chips. Such inquiry should focus on technologies that will help ensure the authenticity of the card, rather than the identity of the bearer.

(2) The Comptroller General of the United States shall explore additional actions that could be taken to reduce the potential for fraudulently obtaining and using social security account number cards.

(3) Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General of the United States shall prepare and transmit to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Finance of the Senate a report setting forth his findings and recommendations under this subsection.

EXON (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 611

Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. DURENBERGER) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) The Treasury Department's decision on August 28, 1985 to postpone until November 1, 1985 implementation of a 60-cent per gallon tariff on imported Brazilian ethanol would cause significant harm to U.S. agricultural and commercial ethanol industries, a loss of jobs in the ethanol and related industries, further deteriorate the U.S. balance of trade, pressure downward commodity prices even further and heighten the long-term threat of more U.S. dependence on imported oil;

(2) This decision clearly is counter to the explicit dictates of the Congress in the passage of Public Law 96-499 adopted by the Congress in 1980 and signed into law by the President;

(3) The potential amount of ethanol which could be imported under reduced tariffs before November 1, 1985 could equal the total amount of annual domestic ethanol production in the United States;

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Senate that—

(1) The 60-cent per gallon tariff on imported ethanol should be immediately implemented.

METZENBAUM AMENDMENT NO. 612

Mr. METZENBAUM proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 44, line 19, insert "for a period of not to exceed two years from the date of enactment of this Act" after "permitted."

GORTON AMENDMENT NO. 613

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. GORTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 68, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section heading:

SEC. 125. TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 614

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to amendment No. 613 intented to be proposed by Mr. GORTON to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

In the proposed amendment, strike out all after "SEC. 125." and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

(a) PROVIDING NEW "O" NONIMMIGRANT CLASSIFICATION FOR SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Section 101(a)(15) (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(15)), as amended by this Act, is further amended—

(1) by inserting "and other than seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities described in section 217(h)(1)" in subparagraph (H)(ii) after "section 216(h)(1)";

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (M);

(3) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (N) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(4) by adding at the end of the following new subparagraph:

"(O) an alien having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning who is coming to the United States to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1).".

(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Chapter 2 of title II is amended by adding after section 216 the following new section:

"SEC. 217. ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor, shall by regulation establish a program (hereafter in this section referred to as 'the program') for the admission into the United States of seasonal agricultural workers (as defined in section 217(h)2).

"(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker (as defined in section 217(h)(2)) may not be approved by the Attorney General unless the petitioner certifies to the Attorney General the following:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYER IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—

"(A) NATURE OF PETITIONER.—The petitioner employs (or contracts for the employment of) individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities, or is an association representing such employers or contractors.

"(B) REQUIREMENTS OF PETITIONS.—For each month concerned and for each agricultural employment region (designated under section 217(i)(1)) in which the petitioner is operating, the petition must specify—

"(i) the total number and qualifications of individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities required in each month, and

"(ii) the type of agricultural work required to be performed by these workers.

"(2) WILL MAKE RECRUITING EFFORT.—The petitioner will make a good faith effort to recruit (as required by the Attorney General in regulations) in the area of intended employment, including the listing of employment opportunities with the appropriate office of a governmental employment service, and will accept for employment able, willing, and qualified workers referred by such office to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities until the commencement of the seasonal agricultural services for which the petitioner has recruited.

"(3) REPORT ON RECRUITMENT.—In the case of a petitioner that has employed seasonal agricultural workers during the previous 12 months, the petitioner will provide a summary of his efforts to recruit domestic workers to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities during that period.

"(4) ADEQUATE WORKING CONDITIONS.—The petitioner will provide such wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed.

"(5) HOUSING.—The petitioner will furnish housing for nonimmigrants described in section 101(a)(15)(O) or, at the petitioner's option and instead of arranging for suitable housing accommodations, will substitute payment of a reasonable housing allowance to the provider of the housing, but only if the housing is otherwise available within the approximate area of employment.

"(6) NOTICE TO ATTORNEY GENERAL OF EMPLOYMENT.—The petitioner will notify the Attorney General of the entering into, or termination, of an employment relationship with a seasonal agricultural worker not later than 72 hours of the time the relationship is entered into or terminated.

"(7) EMPLOYMENT ONLY IN SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ a seasonal agricultural worker for services other than seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(8) LIMITATION ON THE USE OF "O" WORKERS IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ (or petition for the employment) of a nonimmigrant in any job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(O) for seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities when an application for employment in that job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(N) is pending or approved.

"(9) JOB INFORMATION DISCLOSURE TO "O" WORKERS.—The petitioner shall, upon request, disclose in writing to seasonal agricultural workers when an offer of employment is made, the place of employment, the wage rates, the employee benefits to be provided, and any costs to be charged for each of them, the crops and kinds of activities for which the worker may be employed, and the anticipated period of employment.

"(c) SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION.—The Attorney General shall suspend a petitioner's certification under subsection (b) if any of the following conditions exist:

"(1) LABOR DISPUTE.—There is a strike or lockout in the course of a labor dispute which, under the regulations, precludes such certification.

"(2) VOLATION OF TERM OF PREVIOUS CERTIFICATION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The employer at any time during the previous two-year period employed seasonal agricultural workers and the Attorney General has determined, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, that the employer at any time during that period—

"(i) substantially violated an essential term or condition of the labor certification under subsection (b) with respect to the employment of domestic or nonimmigrant workers, or

"(ii) has not paid any penalty for such violations which have been assessed by the Attorney General.

"(B) DISQUALIFICATION LIMITED TO ONE YEAR.—No employer may have its certification suspended under clause (A) for more than one year for any violation described in that clause.

"(3) NOT PROVIDING FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION.—The employer has not provided the Attorney General with satisfactory assurances that if the employment for which the certification is sought is not covered by State workers' compensation law, the employer will provide, at no cost to the worker, insurance covering injury and disease arising out of and in the course of the worker's employment which will provide benefits at least equal to those provided under the State workers' compensation law for comparable employment.

"(d) ROLES OF AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—

"(1) PERMITTING FILING BY AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker, and a labor certification with respect to such a worker, may be filed by an association representing seasonal agricultural employers which use agricultural services.

"(2) TREATMENT OF ASSOCIATIONS ACTING AS EMPLOYERS.—If such an association is a joint or sole employer of seasonal agricultural workers, the certifications obtained under this section by the association may be used for the job opportunities of any of its members requiring such workers to perform agricultural services of a seasonal nature for which the certifications were obtained.

"(3) TREATMENT OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) MEMBER'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY ASSOCIATION OR OTHER MEMBERS.—If an individual member of such an association is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the member, the suspension shall apply only to that member and does not apply to the association unless the Attorney General determines that the association or other member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(4) ASSOCIATION'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY MEMBERS.—If an association representing agricultural employers as an agent, joint employer, or employer is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the association, the suspension shall apply only to the association and does not apply to any individual member of the association unless the Attorney General determines that the member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(e) EXPEDITED ADMINISTRATIVE APPEAL OF SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION UNDER SUBSECTION (c) (2)—

"(1) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES.—The Attorney General shall provide for an expedited procedure for the review of a suspension of certification under subsection (c)(2) or, at the applicant's request, for a de novo administrative hearing respecting the suspension. In the case of a request for such a review or hearing, the Attorney General shall provide that the review or hearing take place not later than 72 hours after the time the request is submitted.

"(f) HEARING DE NOVO BEFORE THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT.—

"(1) JURISDICTION.—On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in the District of Columbia, has jurisdiction to enjoin the Attorney General from suspending the complainant's certification under the program and to order the reinstatement of complainant's certification if it is improperly suspended. In such a case, the court shall determine the matter do move and the burden is on the Attorney General to sustain his suspension.

"(2) PRECEDENCE OF CASES.—Except as to cases the court considers of greater importance, proceedings before the district court, as authorized by this and appeals therefrom, take precedence on the docket over all cases and shall be assigned for hearing and trial or for argument at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) AUTHORITY.—The Attorney General is authorized to take such actions, including imposing appropriate penalties and seeking appropriate injunctive relief and specific performance of contractual obligations, as may be necessary to assure employer compliance with terms and conditions of employment under this section.

"(2) APPROPRIATE DOCUMENTATION.—The Attorney General shall provide for such endorsement of entry and exit documents of seasonal agricultural workers as may be necessary to carryout this section and to provide notice for purposes of section 274A.

"(3) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 214 and the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law regulating admissibility of nonimmigrant workers.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL SERVICES IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The term 'seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities' means services in agricultural employment including planting cultural practices production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting involving perishable commodities (as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture).

"(2) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER.—The term 'seasonal agricultural worker' means a nonimmigrant described in section 101(a)(15)(O).

"(3) CARIBBEAN BASIN.—The terms 'Caribbean Basin' and 'Caribbean Basin Countries' include those countries eligible to be designated by the President as 'beneficiary countries' under section 212(b) of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2702(b)).

"(i) ESTABLISHMENT OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS BY AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.— For purposes of the administration of the program the Attorney General shall designate not more than 10 agricultural employment regions within the United States. The entire United States shall be encompassed by the area of all such regions.

"(2) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS.—After considering the factors described in paragraph (3), if the Attorney general determines that seasonal agricultural workers are required for a month for an agricultural employment region, the Attorney General shall establish a numerical limitation on the number of nonimmigrant visas that may be issued for such workers for that month for that region, except until the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General may not establish a numerical limitation on the number of such visas that may be issued at any given time in excess of 350,000.

"(3) FACTORS IN DETERMINATION.—In making the determination and establishing numerical limitations under paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall—

"(A) base the determinations and limitations on petitions filed under section 217(b)(1),

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A), and

"(D) consult with the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(4) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS AFTER THREE YEARS.—The Attorney General shall establish at the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, a numerical limit on the total number of seasonal agricultural workers to be admitted into all employment regions in the United States under the program at any given time. In establishing a numerical limit under this paragraph, the Attorney General shall—

"(A) consider petitions filed under section 217(b)(1) during the preceding years of the program,

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts under taken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A),

"(D) consult with Secretary of Agriculture, and

"(E) consider the recommendation of the Commission on Agricultural Worker Programs on a numerical limit as provided under section 124(c)(5).

"(5) CHANGES IN NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS IN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—

"(A) INADEQUATE MONTHLY AND REGIONAL LIMITATIONS.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation has been established under paragraphs (2) or (4) for a region for a month, and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes that extraordinary and unusual circumstances have resulted in a significant change in the petitioner's need for seasonal agricultural workers specified in the petition or in the availability of domestic workers who are able, willing, and qualified to perform seasonal agricultural employment, the petitioner may apply to the Attorney General (in such form and manner as the Attorney General shall provide) for an increase in the numerical limitations otherwise established under paragraphs (2) and (4) to accommodate the circumstances.

"(B) DETERMINATION.—The Attorney General shall make a determination on such an application within 72 hours of the date the application is completed. To the extent the application is approved, the Attorney General shall provide for an appropriate increase in the appropriate monthly and regional numerical limitation. The Attorney General may expand the number of workers admitted into the region for which the application is approved by transferring seasonal agricultural workers from another region with a lesser need or by admitting additional workers from foreign countries. In the event the limit on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers for all regions in the United States established under paragraph (4) has been reached at the time the application alleging extraordinary and unusual circumstances is filed, the Attorney General shall follow the procedures in subparagraph (C).

"(C) INCREASE IN THE NUMERICAL LIMITATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers into all employment regions has been established by the Attorney General under paragraph (4) and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes under the provisions of subparagraphs (A) and (B) that extraordinary and unusual circumstances require an increase in the numerical limitation, the Attorney General may provide for an increase in the appropriate numerical limitation in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the total number authorized for admission into all regions. Any such increase authorized by the Attorney General shall terminate upon the end of circumstances requiring it and shall not result in a permanent expansion of the numerical limit established the Attorney General under paragraph (4).

"(j) ENTRY OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—

"(1) ANNUAL TIME LIMITATION.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker under section 101(a)(15)(O) for a period of more than nine months in any calendar year. An alien admitted under section 101(a)(15)(O) during any calendar year will not be eligible for readmission into the United States until he has returned to his country of origin for a period of 3 months.

"(2) VIOLATORS DISQUALIFIED FOR 5 YEARS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker if the alien was admitted to the United States as such a worker within the previous five-year period and the alien during that period violated a term or condition of such previous admission.

"(k) WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of Agriculture and Labor, shall establish through regulation appropriate wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed in the area of intended employment.

"(l) ALLOCATION AND USE OF VISAS UNDER THE PROGRAM.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Nonimmigrant visas for seasonal agricultural workers, within the numerical limitations established under subsection (i)(2), shall be made available as follows:

"(A) PREVIOUS WORKERS.—Visas shall first be made available to qualified nonimmigrants who have previously been admitted as seasonal agricultural workers and who have fully complied with the terms and conditions of any such previous admission, providing priority in consideration among such aliens in the order of the length of time in which they were so employed.

"(B) OTHERS.—Any remaining visas shall be made available to other qualified nonimmigrants.

"(C) TREATMENT OF SPOUSES AND CHILDREN.—A spouse or child of a seasonal agricultural worker is not entitled to a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker by virtue of such relationship, whether or not accompanying or following to join the nonimmigrant, but may be provided a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker if the spouse or child also is qualified as such a worker.

"(D) NO INDIVIDUAL EMPLOYER VISA PETITION REQUIRED.—An alien admitted pursuant to section 101(a)(15) (O) shall not be required to obtain any petition from any prospective employer within the United States in order to obtain a nonimmigrant visa under the program.

"(E) NO LIMITATION TO PARTICULAR EMPLOYER OR CROP.—A nonimmigrant visa issued under the program shall not limit the geographical area (other than by agricultural employment region) within which a seasonal agricultural worker may be employed or limit the type of seasonal agricultural employment services, in perishable commodities, the worker may perform.

"(F) DISQUALIFICATION FROM FEDERAL ASSISTANCE.—A seasonal agricultural worker under the program is not eligible for any program of financial assistance under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government.

"(G) ALLOCATION OF VISAS TO CARIBBEAN BASIN COUNTRIES.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Agriculture, shall establish through regulations the allocation of visas to workers in specific countries under this section. A percentage of the visas issued shall be allocated to qualified workers in countries located in the Caribbean Basin.

"(m) TRUST FUND FOR PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Attorney General shall establish by regulation a trust fund the purpose of which is to provide funds for the administration of the program and to provide a monetary incentive for seasonal agricultural workers in the program to return to their country of origin upon expiration of their visas under the program. The Attorney General shall promulgate such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(2) PAYMENTS INTO TRUST FUND.—In the case of employment of a seasonal agricultural worker under the program—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENT.—The employer shall provide for payment into the trust fund established under this subsection of an amount equivalent to 11 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENT.—There shall be deducted from the wages of the nonimmigrant and paid into such trust fund an amount equivalent to 20 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(C) WAGES DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'wages' has the meaning given such term in section 3121(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, except that for these purposes paragraph (1) of that section shall not apply.

"(3) USE OF AMOUNTS IN TRUST FUND.—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENTS AND INTEREST.—Except as provided in paragraph (B), amounts paid into the trust fund, and interest thereon, shall be used for the purpose of administering the program.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENTS.—Amounts described in paragraph (B) paid into the trust fund with respect to a worker and interest thereon shall be paid to the worker if—

"(i) the worker applies for payment within 30 days of the last day of employment under the program (as verified by the Attorney General) at the United States consulate nearest the worker's residence in the country of origin, and

"(ii) the worker complies with the terms and conditions of the program, including the obligation to be continuously employed (or actively seeking employment) in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(4) EXPANSION OF CONSULATES.—The Secretary of State is authorized to take such steps as may be necessary in order to expand and establish consulates in foreign countries in which aliens are likely to apply for nonimmigrant status under the program.".

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101), as amended by sections 101(b) and 102(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(d) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF LABOR.—(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Labor for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, $10,000,000 for the purposes—

"(A) of recruiting domestic workers for temporary services which might otherwise be performed by seasonal agricultural workers described in section 217, and

"(B) of monitoring terms and conditions under which such temporary and seasonal agricultural workers (and domestic workers employed by the same employers) are employed in the United States.

"(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.—There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the Secretary's duties and responsibilities under section 217.".

(d) PROHIBITING ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—(1) Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)), as amended by sections 113(a) and 122(e)(1) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) An alien (other than an immediate relative specified in section 210(b)) who entered the United States classified as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(O).

(2) Section 248(l) (8 U.S.C. 1258(l)), as amended by section 122(e)(2), is further amended by striking out "(K) or (N)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(K), (N), or (O).".

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of this section apply to petitions and applications filed under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act on or after the first day of the twelfth month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act (hereafter in this section referred to as the "effective date").

(f) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall approve all regulations to be issued implementing sections 101(a)(15)(O) and 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, final regulations to implement such sections shall first be issued, on an interim or other basis, not later than the effective date.

(g) DEPORTATION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS FOR FAILURE TO BE EMPLOYED OR SEEK EMPLOYMENT.—Section 241(a) (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (19) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(20) entered the United States as nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(O) and failed to be continuously employed or actively seeking employment in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1) in accordance with the usual and customary employment patterns and practices.".

(h) SENSE OF CONGRESS RESPECTING ADVISORY COMMISSION.—It is the sense of Congress that the President should establish an advisory commission which shall consult with the Government of Mexico and the governments of other appropriate countries and advise the Attorney General regarding the operation of the seasonal agricultural worker program established under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(i) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 216, as added by section 122(h), the following new item:

"Sec. 217. Seasonal agricultural worker program.".

LEVIN (AND DECONCINI) AMENDMENT NO. 615

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 93, between lines 7 and 8, insert the following:

(k)(1) The Congress finds that because equities exist in a certain group of persons who, while at present in the United States illegally, arrived prior to January 1, 1980, this Act provides the prospect for legislation for such group of persons who meet the eligibility requirements of this Act.

(2) It is not the purpose of this Act to deny employment or to otherwise prevent such group of persons from qualifying for legalization.

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Attorney General shall prescribe regulations to permit any person who would be eligible for legalization under section 202 to remain in the United States and to engage in employment until the end of the application period described in subsection (a)(1).

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 616

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill S. 1200, supra; as follows:

On page 68, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 125. SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

(a) PROVIDING NEW "O" NONIMMIGRANT CLASSIFICATION FOR SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Section 101(a)(15) (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(15)), as amended by this Act, is further amended—

(1) by inserting "and other than seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities described in section 217(h)(1)" in subparagraph (H)(ii) after "section 216(h)(1)";

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (M);

(3) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (N) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(4) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph;

"(O) an alien having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning who is coming to the United States to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1)).".

(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Chapter 2 of title II is amended by adding after section 216 the following new section:

"SEC. 217. ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.

"(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor, shall by regulation establish a program (hereafter in this section referred to as 'the program') for the admission into the United States of seasonal agricultural workers (as defined in section 217(h)(2).

"(b) ADMISSION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker (as defined in section 217(h)(2)) may not be approved by the Attorney General unless the petitioner certifies to the Attorney General the following:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYER IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—

"(A) NATURE OF PETITIONER.—The petitioner employs (or contracts for the employment of) individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities, or is an association representing such employers or contractors.

"(B) REQUIREMENTS OF PETITIONS.—For each month concerned and for each agricultural employment region (designated under section 217(i)(1)) in which the petitioner is operating, the petition must specify—

"(i) the total number and qualifications of individuals in seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities required in each month, and

"(ii) the type of agricultural work required to be performed by these workers.

"(2) WILL MAKE RECRUITING EFFORT.—The petitioner will make a good faith effort to recruit (as required by the Attorney General in regulations) in the area of intended employment, including the listing of employment opportunities with the appropriate office of a governmental employment service, and will accept for employment able, willing, and qualified workers referred by such office to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities until the commencement of the seasonal agricultural services for which the petitioner has recruited.

"(3) REPORT ON RECRUITMENT.—In the case of a petitioner that has employed seasonal agricultural workers during the previous 12 months, the petitioner will provide a summary of his efforts to recruit domestic workers to perform seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities during that period.

"(4) ADEQUATE WORKING CONDITIONS.—The petitioner will provide such wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed.

"(5) HOUSING.—The petitioner will furnish housing for nonimmigrants described in section 101(a)(15)(O) or, at the petitioner's option and instead of arranging for suitable housing accommodations, will substitute payment of a reasonable housing allowance to the provider of the housing, but only if the housing is otherwise available within the approximate area of employment.

"(6) NOTICE TO ATTORNEY GENERAL OF EMPLOYMENT.—The petitioner will notify the Attorney General of the entering into, or termination, of an employment relationship with a seasonal agricultural worker not later than 72 hours of the time the relationship is entered into or terminated.

"(7) EMPLOYMENT ONLY IN SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL EMPOLOYMENT IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ a seasonal agricultural worker for services other than seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"(8) LIMITATION ON THE USE OF 'O' WORKERS IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The petitioner will not employ (or petition for the employment) of a nonimmigrant in any job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(O) for seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities when an application for employment in that job opportunity under section 101(a)(15)(N) is pending or approved.

"(9) JOB INFORMATION DISCLOSURE TO 'O' WORKERS.—The petitioner shall, upon request, disclose in writing to seasonal agricultural workers when an offer of employment is made, the place of employment, the wage rates, the employee benefits to be provided, and any costs to be charged for each of them, the crops and kinds of activities for which the worker may be employed, and the anticipated period of employment.

"(c) SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION.—The Attorney General shall suspend a petitioner's certification under subsection (b) if any of the following conditions exist:

"(1) LABOR DISPUTE.—There is a strike or lockout in the course of a labor dispute which, under the regulations, precludes such certification.

"(2) VIOLATION OF TERM OF PREVIOUS CERTIFICATION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The employer at any time during the previous two-year period employed seasonal agricultural workers and the Attorney General has determined, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, that the employer at any time during that period—

"(i) substantially violated an essential term or condition of the labor certification under subsection (b) with respect to the employment of domestic or nonimmigrant workers, or

"(ii) has not paid any penalty for such violations which have been assessed by the Attorney General.

"(B) DISQUALIFICATION LIMITED TO ONE YEAR.—No employer may have its certification suspended under clause (A) for more than one year for any violation described in that clause.

"(3) NOT PROVIDING FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION.—The employer has not provided the Attorney General with satisfactory assurances that if the employment for which the certification is sought is not covered by State workers' compensation law, the employer will provide, at no cost to the worker, insurance covering injury and disease arising out of and in the course of the worker's employment which will provide benefits at least equal to those provided under the State workers' compensation law for comparable employment.

"(d) ROLES OF AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—

"(1) PERMITTING FILING BY AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—A petition to import an alien as a seasonal agricultural worker, and a labor certification with respect to such a worker, may be filed by an association representing seasonal agricultural employers which use agricultural services.

"(2) TREATMENT OF ASSOCIATIONS ACTING AS EMPLOYERS.—If such an association is a joint or sole employer of seasonal agricultural workers, the certifications obtained under this section by the association may be used for the job opportunities of any of its members requiring such workers to perform agricultural services of a seasonal nature for which the certifications were obtained.

"(3) TREATMENT OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) MEMBER'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY ASSOCIATION OR OTHER MEMBERS.—If an individual member of such an association is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the member, the suspension shall apply only to that member and does not apply to the association unless the Attorney General determines that the association or other member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(4) ASSOCIATION'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY MEMBERS.—If an association representing agricultural employers as an agent, joint employer, or employer is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (c)(2) results in the suspension of certification with respect to the association, the suspension shall apply only to the association and does not apply to any individual member of the association unless the Attorney General determines that the member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(e) EXPEDITED ADMINISTRATIVE APPEAL OF SUSPENSION OF CERTIFICATION UNDER SUBSECTION (c)(2)—

"(1) EXPEDITED PROCEDURES.—The Attorney General shall provide for an expedited procedure for the review of a suspension of certification under subsection (c)(2) or, at the applicant's request, for a de novo administrative hearing respecting the suspension. In the case of a request for such a review or hearing, the Attorney General shall provide that the review or hearing take place not later than 72 hours after the time the request is submitted.

"(f) HEARING DE NOVO BEFORE THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT.—

"(1) JURISDICTION.—On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in the District of Columbia, has jurisdiction to enjoin the Attorney General from suspending the complainant's certification under the program and to order the reinstatement of complainant's certification if it is improperly suspended. In such a case, the court shall determine the matter de novo and the burden is on the Attorney General to sustain his suspension.

"(2) PRECEDENCE OF CASES.—Except as to cases the court considers of greater importance, proceedings before the district court, as authorized by this and appeals therefrom, take precedence on the docket over all cases and shall be assigned for hearing and trial or for argument at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) AUTHORITY.—The Attorney General is authorized to take such actions, including imposing appropriate penalties and seeking appropriate injunctive relief and specific performance of contractual obligations, as may be necessary to assure employer compliance with terms and conditions of employment under this section.

"(2) APPROPRIATE DOCUMENTATION.—The Attorney General shall provide for such endorsement of entry and exit documents of seasonal agricultural workers as may be necessary to carry out this section and to provide notice for purposes of section 274A.

"(3) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 214 and the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law regulating admissibility of nonimmigrant workers.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL SERVICES IN PERISHABLE COMMODITIES.—The term 'seasonal agricultural services in perishable commodities' means services in agricultural employment (as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 203(f)) involving perishable commodities (as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture).

"(2) SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER.—The term 'seasonal agricultural worker' means a nonimmigrant described in section 101(a)(15)(O).

"(3) CARIBBEAN BASIN.—The terms 'Caribbean Basin' and 'Caribbean Basin Countries' include those countries eligible to be designated by the President as 'beneficiary countries' under section 212(b) of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2702(b)).

"(i) ESTABLISHMENT OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS BY AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT REGION.—For purposes of the administration of the program the Attorney General shall designate not more than 10 agricultural employment regions within the United States. The entire United States shall be encompassed by the area of all such regions.

"(2) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS.—After considering the factors described in paragraph (3), if the Attorney General determines that seasonal agricultural workers are required for a month for an agricultural employment region, the Attorney General shall establish a numerical limitation on the number of nonimmigrant visas that may be issued for such workers for that month for that region, except until the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General may not establish a numerical limitation on the number of such visas that may be issued at any given time in excess of 350,000.

"(3) FACTORS IN DETERMINATION.—In making the determination and establishing numerical limitations under paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall—

"(A) base the determinations and limitations on petitions filed under section 217(b)(1),

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts undertaken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A), and

"(D) consult with the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(4) NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS AFTER 3 YEARS.—The Attorney General shall establish at the end of the third year after the effective date of this Act, a numerical limit on the total number of seasonal agricultural workers to be admitted into all employment regions in the United States under the program at any given time. In establishing a numerical limit under this paragraph, the Attorney General shall—

"(A) consider petitions filed under section 217(b)(1) during the preceding years of the program,

"(B) take into consideration the historical employment needs of agricultural employers and the availability of able, willing, and qualified domestic labor,

"(C) take into consideration the recruitment efforts under taken by the Secretary of Labor under section 404(d)(1)(A),

"(D) consult with Secretary of Agriculture, and

"(E) consider the recommendation of the Commission on Agricultural Worker Programs on a numerical limit as provided under section 124(c)(5).

"(5) CHANGES IN NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS IN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—

"(A) INADEQUATE MONTHLY AND REGIONAL LIMITATIONS.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation has been established under paragraphs (2) or (4) for a region for a month, and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) established that extraordinary and unusual circumstances have resulted in a significant change in the petitioner's need for seasonal agricultural workers specified in the petition or in the availability of domestic workers who are able, willing, and qualified to perform seasonal agricultural employment, the petitioner may apply to the Attorney General (in such form and manner as the Attorney General shall provide) for an increase in the numerical limitations otherwise established under paragraphs (2) and (4) to accommodate the circumstances.

"(B) DETERMINATION.—The Attorney General shall make a determination on such an application within 72 hours of the date the application is completed. To the extent the application is approved, the Attorney General shall provide for an appropriate increase in the appropriate monthly and regional numerical limitation. The Attorney General may expand the number of workers admitted into the region for which the application is approved by transferring seasonal agricultural workers from another region with a lesser need or by admitting additional workers from foreign countries. In the event the limit on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers for all regions in the United States established under paragraph (4) has been reached at the time the application alleging extraordinary and unusual circumstances is filed, the Attorney General shall follow the procedures in subparagraph (C).

"(C) INCREASE IN THE NUMERICAL LIMITATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—If—

"(i) a numerical limitation on the admission of seasonal agricultural workers into all employment regions has been established by the Attorney General under paragraph (4) and

"(ii) a petitioner described in section 217(b)(1) establishes under the provisions of subparagraphs (A) and (B) that extraordinary and unusual circumstances require an increase in the numerical limitation, the Attorney General may provide for an increase in the appropriate numerical limitation in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the total number authorized for admission into all regions. Any such increase authorized by the Attorny General shall terminate upon the end of circumstances requiring it and shall not result in a permanent expansion of the numerical limit established the Attorney General under paragraph (4).

"(j) ENTRY OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—

"(1) ANNUAL TIME LIMITATION.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker under section 101(a)(15)(O) for a period of more than nine months in any calendar year. An alien admitted under section 101(a)(15)(O) during any calendar year will not be eligible for readmission into the United States until he has returned to his country of origin for a period of 3 months.

"(2) VIOLATORS DISQUALIFIED FOR 5 YEARS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a seasonal agricultural worker if the alien was admitted to the United States as such a worker within the previous five-year period and the alien during that period violated a term or condition of such previous admission.

"(k) WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of Agriculture and Labor, shall establish through regulation appropriate wages and working conditions as will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed in the area of intended employment.

"(l) ALLOCATION AND USE OF VISAS UNDER THE PROGRAM.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Nonimmigrant visas for seasonal agricultural workers, within the numerical limitations established under subsection (i)(2), shall be made available as follows:

"(A) PREVIOUS WORKERS.—Visas shall first be made available to qualified nonimmigrants who have previously been admitted as seasonal agricultural workers and who have fully complied with the terms and conditions of any such previous admission, providing priority in consideration among such aliens in the order of the length of time which they were so employed.

"(B) OTHERS.—Any remaining visas shall be made available to other qualified nonimmigrants.

"(C) TREATMENT OF SPOUSES AND CHILDREN.—A spouse or child of a seasonal agricultural worker is not entitled to a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker by virtue of such relationship, whether or not accompanying or following to join the nonimmigrant, but may be provided a nonimmigrant visa as such a worker if the spouse or child also is a qualified as such a worker.

"(D) NO INDIVIDUAL EMPLOYER VISA PETITION REQUIRED.—An alien admitted pursuant to section 101(a)(15)(O) shall not be required to obtain any petition from any prospective employer within the United States in order to obtain a nonimmigrant visa under the program.

"(E) NO LIMITATION TO PARTICULAR EMPLOYER OR CROP.—A nonimmigrant visa issued under the program shall not limit the geographical area (other than by agricultural employment region) within which a seasonal agricultural worker may be employed or limit the type of seasonal agricultural employment services, in perishable commodities, the worker may perform.

"(F) DISQUALIFICATION FROM FEDERAL ASSISTANCE.—A seasonal agricultural worker under the program is not eligible for any program of financial assistance under Federal law (whether through grant, loan, guarantee, or otherwise) on the basis of financial need, as such programs are identified by the Attorney General in consultation with other appropriate heads of the various departments and agencies of Government.

"(G) ALLOCATION OF VISAS TO CARIBBEAN BASIN COUNTRIES.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretaries of State and Agriculture, shall establish through regulations the allocation of visas to workers in specific countries under this section. A percentage of the visas issued shall be allocated to qualified workers in countries located in the Caribbean Basin.

"(m) TRUST FUND FOR PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Attorney General shall establish by regulation a trust fund the purpose of which is to provide funds for the administration of the program and to provide a monetary incentive for seasonal agricultural workers in the program to return to their country of origin upon expiration of their visas under the program. The Attorney General shall promulgate such other regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(2) PAYMENTS INTO TRUST FUND.—In the case of employment of a seasonal agricultural worker under the program—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENT.—The employer shall provide for payment into the trust fund established under this subsection of an amount equivalent to 11 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENT.—There shall be deducted from the wages of the nonimmigrant and paid into such trust fund an amount equivalent to 20 percent of the wages of the worker.

"(C) WAGES DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'wages' has the meaning given such term in section 3121(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, except that for these purposes paragraph (1) of that section shall not apply.

"(3) USE OF AMOUNTS IN TRUST FUND.—

"(A) EMPLOYER PAYMENTS AND INTEREST.—Except as provided in paragraph (B), amounts paid into the trust fund, and interest thereon, shall be used for the purpose of administering the program.

"(B) WORKER PAYMENTS.—Amounts described in paragraph (B) paid into the trust fund with respect to a worker and interest thereon shall be paid to the worker if—

"(i) the worker applies for payment within 30 days of the last day of employment under the program (as verified by the Attorney General) at the United States consulate nearest the worker's residence in the country of origin, and

"(ii) the worker complies with the terms and conditions of the program, including the obligation to be continuously employed (or actively seeking employment) in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities.

"((4) EXPANSION OF CONSULATES.—The Secretary of State is authorized to take such steps as may be necessary in order to expand and establish consulates in foreign countries in which aliens are likely to apply for nonimmigrant status under the program.".

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101), as amended by sections 101(b) and 102(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(d) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF LABOR.—(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Labor for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, $10,000,000 for the purposes—

"(A) of recruiting domestic workers for temporary services which might otherwise be performed by seasonal agricultural workers described in section 217, and

"(B) of monitoring terms and conditions under which such temporary and seasonal agricultural workers (and domestic workers employed by the same employers) are employed in the United States.

"(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.—There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year 1986, such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the Secretary's duties and responsibilities under section 217.".

(d) PROHIBITING ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—(1)

Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)), as amended by sections 113(a) and 122(e)(1) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) An alien (other than an immediate relative specified in section 210(b)) who entered the United States classified as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(O).

(2) Section 248(1) (8 U.S.C. 1258(1)), as amended by section 122(e)(2), is further amended by striking out "(K) or (N)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(K), (N), or (O).".

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of this section apply to petitions and applications filed under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act on or after the first day of the twelfth month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act (hereafter in this section referred to as the "effective date").

(f) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall approve all regulations to be issued implementing sections 101(a)(15)(O) and 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, final regulations to implement such sections shall first be issued, on an interim or other basis, not later than the effective date.

(g) DEPORTATION OF SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKERS FOR FAILURE TO BE EMPLOYED OR SEEK EMPLOYMENT.—Section 241(a) (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (19) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(20) entered the United States as nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(O) and failed to be continuously employed or actively seeking employment in seasonal agricultural employment in perishable commodities (as defined in section 217(h)(1) in accordance with the usual and customary employment patterns and practices.".

(h) SENSE OF CONGRESS RESPECTING ADVISORY COMMISSION.—It is the sense of Congress that the President should establish an advisory commission which shall consult with the Government of Mexico and the governments of other appropriate countries and advise the Attorney General regarding the operation of the seasonal agricultural worker program established under section 217 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(i) Conforming Amendment to Table of Contents.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 216, as added by section 122(h), the following new item:

"Sec. 217. Seasonal agricultural worker program."

On Page 2, in the table of contents of the bill, insert after the item relating to section 124 the following new item:

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NEW LEADERSHIP FROM CWA, AN OUTSTANDING "PUBLIC CITIZEN"

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, shortly before Congress adjourned in August, the Communications Workers of America, the largest telecommunications union in the world, elected Morton Bahr to serve as its new president.

Although CWA is more than 47 years old, the union has had but three chief executives in its history. Its founding father, the late Joseph Anthony Beirne, served as president for more than 35 years. His successor, Glenn E. Watts, presided over the CWA for the last 11 years, until he retired voluntarily in mid-July.

On July 16, union delegates attending the CWA convention in San Francisco chose "Morty" Bahr to receive the mantle of leadership.

Mr. President, as the ranking member of the Senate Communications Subcommittee, I am well aware of the revolutionary changes that are taking place in the telecommunications industry. CWA members in Oregon and throughout the Nation are on the cutting edge of the dramatic technological breakthroughs that are altering our society.

In these times of change, CWA is fortunate to have chosen as its new leader a man who has the steadfastness and the vision to keep both feet on the ground while reaching for the stars.

Morton Bahr has established a reputation as an effective organizer, a competent administrator, and an astute participant in the political process.

Along a similar line, I am proud to have been allied with CWA during the last Congress in support of legislation to place a moratorium on the imposition of an access charge for telephone service. If that misguided proposal had been implemented, as first put forth by the Federal Communications Commission, it could have forced millions of consumers to give up their telephone.

Thanks in part to CWA's grassroots and Capitol Hill lobbying, the FCC modified its initial proposal. After a groundswell of public opinion, it became clear that Congress would not accept making telephone subscribers pay as much as double-digit amounts each month for the privilege of receiving a dial tone, regardless of the frequency of telephone use.

I am also pleased to have been of assistance in achieving the enactment of pension portability legislation which protected the net credited service rights of telephone company workers who changed employment subsequent to divestiture.

Mr. President, the CWA is a prime example of an outstanding "public citizen" in our pluralistic society, an effective organization that enhances the quality of life of all Americans.

At this time of leadership transition, I want to congratulate Morton Bahr on his election as president and wish him and CWA all the best in the coming years.●

COL. JAY P. SELLICK, 41 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE U.S. ARMY AND HIS NATION

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a distinguished citizen from Tennessee who has spent 41 years in service to his country. He is Col. Jay P. Sellick.

On January 21, 1944, at the height of the greatest war in history, Jay Sellick enlisted in the U.S. Army. From that time, Jay Sellick rose through the enlisted ranks serving as an infantry platoon leader, an aviation officer, an aviation platoon leader, an adjutant, provost marshal, an assistant chief of staff, and command and general staff college instructor. Jay Sellick completed his career as commander of the 401st Military Police Camp with the rank of colonel.

On August 31, 1985, the Army lost one of its most selfless leaders when Col. Jay Sellick retired.

Colonel Sellick epitomized the concept of duty and devotion to his country. This is a man who was an active participant in projects even when not assigned to a unit. It is that spirit of duty that made this country great. Colonel Sellick's actions are living testimony to the tradition that made Tennessee the Volunteer State.

During his long career, Colonel Sellick witnessed many changes in the Armed Forces of this country, many were implemented due to his leadership. One of the primary areas where change has occurred due to his initiative is in the function of the military police.

In 1980, Colonel Sellick was the first U.S. Army Reserve-Troop Program unit officer awarded the honorary faculty award by the U.S. Army Military Police School. He is recognized throughout the Army as a leader and developer of doctrine covering military police activities, particularly those relating to enemy prisoner of war operations.

In closing, it is evident that Colonel Sellick's career in the Army can be summed up with the words spoken by General Douglas MacArthur at his farewell address to the cadets at West Point: "duty, honor, country."●

POOR AS DIRT

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring to your attention the lyrics and musical composition of Mike Butler, of Waterloo, IA.

For the last 6 years, this young man has made farming the topic of over 60 original songs. He seeks to establish an ever growing collection of compositions which portray farm society and which he refers to as farm music.

Mr. Butler's musical reflection of farm society and the concerns of farmers is perhaps best expressed in a recent lyric entitled "Poor as Dirt" which follows:

The lyrics follow:

"POOR AS DIRT"
(By Mike Butler)

Poor as dirt . . . that's how we used to be.
We had horses pullin plows. We had to live dirt cheap.
But now the tractor that I ride has all that horse power deep inside.
The work that I just did today. It used to take the month of May.
Through all those years of livin cheap.
I always thought I'd get to keep my dirt.
Poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt.
This land is my land . . . I built this farm with my bare hands.
And to kick me off you're gonna have to find a better man.
Poor as dirt . . . take everything you need.
Just leave me poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt.
Poor as dirt . . . that's how we lived our lives.
And as long as there was land to farm. We knew that we'd survive.
But now I'm into high finance. A man like me don't stand a chance.
I beat the floods and shook the drought. And now they come to run me out.
Through all those years of livin cheap.
I always thought I'd get to keep my dirt.
Poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt . . . Poor as dirt.●

THE 1985 NATIONAL YOUTH OF THE YEAR

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, next week, Elgin Clemons of Little Rock, AR, will compete as one of the five finalists for the 1985 National Youth of the Year Program, sponsored by the Boys Club of America and the Reader's Digest Foundation.

This 18-year-old youth will represent the Little Rock Boys Club, the State of Arkansas, and the southwestern region of Boys Clubs of America.

Recently, the Arkansas State Press News Service published an article about Elgin, which I would like to share with my colleagues, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

I want to congratulate this outstanding young man and wish him well in the national competition.

The article follows:

LR TEEN TO REPRESENT SOUTHWEST IN BOYS CLUB NATIONAL YOUTH OF THE YEAR PROGRAM

Elgin R. Clemons, 18, a member of the William E. Thrasher Boys Club in Little Rock, AR, has been named one of five finalists in the 1985 National Youth of the Year program, sponsored by Boys Club of America and the Reader's Digest Foundation.

A resident of Little Rock, Clemons will represent the Southwest in the national finals in Washington, D.C., September 16-18. The National Youth of the Year will be installed by President Ronald Reagan, Honorary Chairman of Boys Club of America, at a White House ceremony on Wednesday, September 18.

"The Thrasher Boys Club came into my life at a time when I most needed it," Clemons said.●

ACHIEVEMENT IN VOLUNTARISM PROGRAM

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, on September 17, 1985, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Department of Education, the Farmers Home Administration, and the Future Farmers of America will honor its winners in the annual Achievement in Voluntarism Program. One of those recipients is an Arkansas native, Keith Anthony Marshall of Lake City, AR.

Keith was instrumental in securing improvements to the city park in Lake City. He attended city council meetings at which he presented plans and a proposed budget for improvements to the park. Under this young man's supervision, the local FFA chapter constructed a full size basketball court, goals, and bleachers, as well as landscaping the existing park.

Perhaps his accomplishments are best summed up by Arkansas Public Service Commission member and former Lake City mayor Pat Qualls, whose letter I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

I commend this young man for his hard work and dedication to his community. He is a fine example of the American spirit of voluntarism.

The letter follows:

ARKANSAS PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION,
Little Rock, April 30, 1985.

Re Keith Marshall

NATIONAL ACHIEVEMENT AND VOLUNTARISM,
Applicant Review Board,
Lake City, Arkansas.

GENTLEMEN: Before being appointed to the Arkansas Public Service Commission, I served as the Mayor of Lake City from 1979 to 1984. During 1982 and 1983 I had the opportunity and privilege of working with Keith Marshall on the BOAC Project.

Keith, as BOAC Chairman, attended city council meetings at which he presented the plans and budget for making improvements and additions to the city park. Under Keith's supervision, leadership and motivation the BOAC Team constructed a full size basketball court, goals, bleachers and also did landscaping and repair to the existing park.

While most high school boys were spending their free time after school and on the weekends playing and driving around in an automobile, Keith spent that time working at the park. He contributed hundreds of hours of work toward improving the park.

Keith is a fine outstanding young man. His character and morals are of the utmost quality. He is a gentleman in every sense of the word. I would unequivocally recommend Keith Marshall for the National Achievement and Voluntarism Award.

Cordially,

Patricia S. Qualls.●

ORDERS FOR MONDAY

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on completion of its business today the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 noon on Monday, September 16, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

READING OF THE JOURNAL, RESOLUTIONS, AND CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, September 16, 1985, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, no resolutions come over under the rule, and the call of the calendar be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order there be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the special order just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each and provided further that the morning hour be deemed to have expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following routine morning business, it will be the intention of the majority leader to resume consideration of S. 1200, the immigration reform issue. There will be no votes during Monday's session due to the Jewish holiday Rosh Hashanah.

Mr. President, I indicate that there will be rollcall votes on Tuesday, September 17, 1985.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1985

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 noon, Monday, September 16, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at 6:49 p.m., adjourned until Monday, September 16, 1985, at 12 noon.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate September 13, 1985:

IN THE NAVY

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be admiral

Vice Adm. James A. Lyons, Jr., xxx-xx-x... xxx-x... 1110, U.S. Navy.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

EARLY ASAT TEST: A BAD MISTAKE

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has announced plans to conduct an antisatellite [Asat] weapons test today against a live target in space. This is being done earlier than previously planned in order, the administration says, to demonstrate American resolve. However, we must ask whether this would be only an action of bravado in defiance of logic and contrary to American security interests.

In a recent article in the Washington Post, Adm. Noel Gayler pointed out that the United States is far more dependent on its military satellites than are the Soviets for keeping track of activities of adversaries and for directing its armed forces, conventional and nuclear. The Soviet Asat system is feeble and does not threaten important U.S. military satellites. A successful Asat test by the United States surely would cause the Soviets to end their unilateral moratorium on Asat testing, scuttling hopes for a bilateral Asat treaty. Moreover, the Soviets would most certainly follow the U.S. lead and develop their own weapons systems to close the only effective window through which to view Soviet activities.

Mr. Speaker, it would be a mistake to brand Admiral Gaylor's criticism of the administration's Asat Program as political sniping. The retired admiral is a distinguished military leader who previously held the position of commander-in-chief of the Pacific forces and was director of the National Security Agency during the Nixon administration.

At this point, I would like to call the admiral's article to the attention of my colleagues and urge them to consider his advice.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 8, 1985]

REAGAN'S ASAT BOOMERANG

(By Noel Gayler)

The Reagan administration appears intent on testing our newest anti-satellite weapon soon. Many observers think this move is part of a new get-tough offensive on the part of the United States, to get a leg up on the Geneva arms-control negotiations and the Reagan-Gorbachev summit. It seems more likely, however, that the timing was determined by the weapon program itself—never mind the consequences.

It's time to take a look at the consequences of making space still another battle area. We are shooting ourselves, not in the foot, but a lot closer to the head. Of course, we are responding to the current Soviet effort, itself a possible response to our own earlier capability. This cycle is a formula for continuing escalation of the arms race indefinitely.

In the past, none of these weapons has had a capability against many of the satellites that are most important to us. But when the Soviets match us again, as they inevitably will, then even in the outermost reaches of space there will be no sanctuary. Few satellites, military or civilian, will be safe. Our own space shuttle will be at risk. So will the Soviet manned space stations.

The crux of the issue for us is that we Americans are far more dependent on the use of space—at least for military purposes—than the Soviets are. We depend greatly on space for military communications, for command and control, for navigation and precise position-finding. The high accuracy we assume for certain missiles systems in our nuclear deterrent is dependent on satellites.

Most important of all, we need satellites to know what is going on. The detailed pictures we can take from space afford an extraordinary overview of every activity within the vast Soviet land mass. Not at all incidentally, satellites can give us a similar overview of other areas of the world—in time, for example, to detect and avert preparations for South Africa's nuclear weapons testing in 1977.

Nor is this all. Satellites can "see" enormous portions of the earth's surface. Equipped with radar, or infrared detectors or listening receivers, they can supplement photographs to fill in the whole picture. From our intelligence perspective, we would be almost helpless without them, in this complex technological world.

From the standpoint of the Soviets, the situation is quite different. We are an open society. Vast amounts of military, political and industrial information are available to anyone—including the Soviets—for the price of subscription to a technical journal. Congressional testimony, official publications, contractors' brochures and newspaper stories are another rich lode of information.

The Soviets hardly need satellites to observe us. We "tell them all about it," so far as our own affairs are concerned. It's even difficult to imagine why they bother with satellite surveillance of us, except, possibly to attempt to track ships at sea—no easy task.

The development of anti-satellite weapons on both sides will, therefore, hurt us far more than it will hurt them.

We are not talking here about the administration's Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) or "Star Wars" proposal. Although some of the technology is applicable to both ASAT and Star Wars, the problems posed in developing an anti-satellite system are infinitely simpler.

What are these "anti-satellite weapons?" The earliest were nuclear-tipped rockets, fired in the general direction of the target, and killing with a nuclear blast. Some others are simply satellites, maneuvered into a collision with the target satellite. The present Soviet ASAT is of this kind. Some are so-called space mines: companion satellites orbiting in close proximity to the target that can be shown up instantaneously on command, taking the victim with them. And some, far less developed, are laser or energy beams. The beams may be directed in space from one satellite against another, or from the ground to the target via a mirror in space.

The current Soviet anti-satellite weapon, which has been around for a while, is a dog. No doubt the Soviets can and will do better, if we reach no agreement with them. But an agreement that prevented the further development of satellite killers by either side would be so much in our own American interest that, if we can get it, we should grab it. The Soviets' operational capability is minimal. Ours, potentially much better, is not yet fully developed. Now is the time to make a deal.

Can we trust the Russians? How can we verify such an agreement, once it is signed? Here the situation looks pretty good. A treaty stopping anti-satellite development would be readily verifiable. It's hard to hide activity in space. There's a cold black uncluttered background that makes detection easy. Satellite orbits are predictable, and orbital changes characteristic of anti-satellite tests stand out like a sore thumb. The characteristic dependence on specialized ground support is another giveaway.

Thus the very nature of space makes it unlikely that the Soviets would be able to develop a weapon clandestinely and then test it in space without our knowing about it. Moreover, even if they did develop an anti-satellite weapon, they would be unable to take out all our satellites simultaneously. So "breakout" of a significant ASAT capability, after clandestine development—that is, to be able to mount a surprise attack on a whole group of satellites—is totally unlikely.

Even if it made any sense to test our anti-satellite weapon, to do so in advance of the Geneva talks makes no sense when we have so much to lose and so little, relatively, to gain. Testing now won't compel the Soviets to shape up at Geneva to our liking; rather they will raise the ante. Those who have had experience negotiating with the Soviets know this is by far the likeliest outcome of an attempt to twist their arm publicly.

Then there are the civilian uses of space, growing in importance everyday. From exploration of the far universe, to unlocking the secrets of energy and matter, to assessing the resources of earth, space has become indispensable. Weather reporting, television, communications—all are dependent on it.

The practitioners in space from hard-headed administrators like James S. Beggs, administrator of NASA, and Roald Sagdeev of the Soviet Space Institute, dreamers like Isaac Asimov and Carl Sagan, cosmonauts and astronauts alike have spoken eloquently about the future of mankind in the cosmos. Surely we cannot wish to put all this at risk.

Nor is space the exclusive property of the Soviets and ourselves, or of East and West or even of the developed nations. It is the inheritance of all mankind. No one of us has an exclusive right to control it, and no one of us is likely to own the effective means to control it, however hard and recklessly we may try.

But there is a worse concern. Just as atomic weapons, once our sole possession, spread first to the Soviets and then to a dozen nations, so will the capability to shoot down satellites. And with each player the risks will increase exponentially.

If we will look, we can see two roads into the future: one road perilous to ourselves and all others, the other leading to the peaceful use of space for all mankind.

If we will listen, we can hear the voices of sanity here, in Russia and around the world saying, "Put an end to the arms race in space".

And if we will stop—we and the Soviets—we can set an example that will keep space free of threat. Now is the time. Geneva is the place. Leadership is the key.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO GEORGE SHOICHI OKI

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge your special recognition of Mr. George Shoichi Oki, one of my most admired and well respected constituents who is being honored on August 23, 1985 as Agribusiness Person of the Year by the Sacramento Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce.

Throughout his life, George Oki has sought to serve the community in which he lives and in which he operates his business. A Sacramento native, he has resided here continuously, except for a 5-year period during World War II when his family was sent to an internment camp as part of the U.S. Government's policy against Americans of Japanese ancestry. After pursuing his education at the University of Oklahoma as a petroleum engineering major and after serving in the U.S. Air Force as a control tower operator, he returned to Sacramento at the end of the war with his brother, Richard, to help run the small family owned nursery business begun in 1907 by his father, Magoichi Oki.

As the result of many years of dedication and hard work, they built the Oki Nursery Company into one of the nation's 12 largest wholesale nursery industries. Today, the firm operates a massive 1-million-square-foot greenhouse complex at its Keifer Boulevard location in Sacramento and has expanded operations to San Jose, CA and to Portland, OR.

A strong community leader, George Oki serves as a board member on an impressive array of public service organizations and groups, including the Camellia Festival Association, the Matsuyama Sister City Corporation, the Sacramento Rotary Club, the Sumitomo Bank of Sacramento, the California Farm Bureau and the Sacramento Tree Foundation. Besides being a leader in the community and in the agricultural industry, George Oki has continued to demonstrate strong family ties. He and his wife, Joan, have been married 37 years and they have three children, George Samuel, Lorence and JoAnn and five grandchildren. The two sons are also executives in the family's nursery business.

On behalf of the people of Sacramento, I would like to take this opportunity to personally congratulate and commend George Oki on his outstanding contributions to our community and to his industry.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO JAPAN 85: THE PACIFIC CONNECTION

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, Weinstock's department stores in California, Nevada and Utah are conducting an exciting 18-day celebration of Japanese culture that will enrich Americans of all ethnic backgrounds.

The festivity, entitled Japan 85: The Pacific Connection, will include exhibits, speeches, and displays all created to enhance American awareness of Japanese culture. Exciting pre-gala events will consist of a special performance of Madame Butterfly at the Community Center Theatre September 12 followed by a formal party, and Opening Day ceremonies September 13. Japan 85 will run from September 12 through September 29.

Mr. Speaker, Japan 85 is clearly full of fun and entertainment. Even more importantly, it serves to create an understanding and appreciation between different cultures; the crucial first step towards world peace.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to Cheryl Nido Turpin, President and Chief Executive Officer of Weinstock's in Sacramento, California for the magnificent job she has done in organizing this enlightening and educational event.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO MAJ. GEN. DEWEY K.K. LOWE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, one of the most admired and respected citizens in the Sacramento metropolitan area, Major General Dewey K.K. Lowe, has been named deputy general manager of the Sacramento Municipal Utility District. This is an important event, Mr. Speaker, because it assures us that Dewey Lowe will remain with our community long after 1986, the year he was expected to retire from the military.

General Lowe is commander of McClellan Air Force Base's Air Logistics Center and his tenure has been marked by nothing less than efficiency and accomplishment. Over the past five years, he turned a base that was near closing into one of the top operations in the Air Force. In doing so, he improved the military readiness of our country and secured McClellan as a fixture in Sacramento's economy.

To many this comes as no surprise. Throughout his military career, Dewey Lowe has always demonstrated a high caliber of excellence—a fact clearly borne out by his many military decorations and assignments. He entered the U.S. Army Air Forces in 1943 and received his pilot wings and commission as a second lieutenant in February 1944. During service in World War II, the Korean War and the Vietnam War, Lowe's awards and decorations included the Distinguished Service Medal, the Legion of Merit, the Distinguished Flying Cross with two oak leaf clusters and the Bronze Star.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the directors of SMUD have selected a highly trained individual for this new position. He is a man respected by his colleagues in the military and loved by his friends and family in Sacramento. All of us wish him well.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO SACRAMENTO HISTORY CENTER

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in honor of the newly constructed Sacramento History Center. This building not only houses countless artifacts from Sacramento's past, but as a reconstruction in red brick of the original 1854 City Hall and Waterworks Building, it also stands as a monument in its own right.

The grand opening of the Sacramento History Center coincides with the beginning of History Week in California's capital city. This nine-day celebration, sponsored by the County Historical Society, will include a native American exhibit and a special recognition of the California Almond Growers Exchange on their 75th anniversary.

The four galleries of the museum—Topomorphology, Community, Agricultural Technology, and the Eleanor McClatchy—feature a development of Sacramento as a diverse political and agricultural center of California. The creation of this museum will emphasize Sacramento's important place in the history of California and will help make local residents aware of their own history, which is so important in developing a community identity. Among the events scheduled for this opening week are live acts and plays from the early days of Sacramento, a display of classical agricultural machinery and a tribute to the late Eleanor McClatchy, a great Sacramento citizen and philanthropist.

Mr. Speaker, on this day I salute both those individuals who have contributed to the creation and development of the Sacramento History Center as well as those whom the History Center celebrates.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO MYRTLE OWEN

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to offer my congratulations and best wishes to Myrtle Owen, who is being honored on August 30, 1985, as Resident of the Year representing nursing facilities throughout the Sacramento metropolitan area.

Myrtle Owen, a resident of the Somerset Convalescent Hospital, is receiving the award from the Therapeutic Activity Social Coordinators who describe the 95-year-old lady as someone who enjoys each day to its fullest and as a warm, loving person who is growing old graciously.

It is indeed rare to find an individual who lives and enjoys life one day at a time. They exude a bright glow in their thoughts and actions that warms our hearts and makes us feel happy and privileged just to have known them. Myrtle Owen is one such person. Her vitality and spirit are sources of inspiration to all who know her.

As part of her recognition, she will have a long-cherished desire fulfilled with an air trip to San Francisco and a tour of Fisherman's Wharf arranged by the East Yolo Rotary Club.

On behalf of the citizens of our community, I would like to commend Myrtle Owen for her enthusiasm and her love of life and wish her many more years of joy and happiness.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO PAUL HAGAN

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend Paul Hagan, an outstanding member of the Rancho Cordova community who is retiring after an exemplary career spanning 25 years as chief administrator of the Cordova Recreation and Park District.

Paul's hard work and cheerful manner has earned him the admiration of friends and the respect of colleagues, associates and residents throughout the Rancho Cordova area.

Paul has a long and impressive history of civic and professional involvement and recognition as well. Among his honors are the Harris Fellowship, which is the Rotary Club's highest award for outstanding community service, a prestigious state fellowship from the California Park and Recreation Society as well as two professional citations from that organization in 1966 and 1973. In addition, he has served the community as president of the Rancho Cordova Area Chamber of Commerce, the Rancho Cordova Rotary Club, the Rancho Cordova chapter of the United Service Organization and as chairman of the Sacramento chapter of the American Red Cross. He also has served as a member of the board of directors of the Cordova Community Council.

Last November, Rancho Cordova demonstrated its deep respect and appreciation for Paul's many years of dedicated service by renaming the 61-acre Cordova Community Park as Hagan Community Park.

The Sacramento and Rancho Cordova areas could never fully acknowledge all of the outstanding contributions Paul Hagan has made to our community. I join with all of Paul's family and friends in saluting him on a job well done and in wishing him a most enjoyable retirement.

PASSING OF CHARLES SANDMAN

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, Charles W. Sandman, Jr., served the people of the State of New Jersey for much of his life, which ended suddenly on August 26.

Our colleagues will recall his service in the House of Representatives from 1967 to 1974, a period just preceding my election to this body. But his record of service also included membership in the State legislature, superior court, and U.S. Army Air Corps in World War II.

A prominent figure in State politics, Mr. Sandman was the 1973 Republican nominee for Governor.

Our State has lost a dedicated and distinguished public servant. His passing was noted in a eulogy by the editors of the Record of Bergen County, and I would like to include it for the benefit of our colleagues.

The editorial follows:

CHARLES W. SANDMAN

The line on Charles Sandman was that you loved him or you hated him, but the truth was a lot more complicated. It was possible to dislike the style and substance of his campaigns for governor, or his blustering defense of President Nixon at congressional Watergate hearings, and still have affection for the cocky man with the broad grin and the gift for bouncing back from defeat. Mr. Sandman died of a stroke this week at the age of 63.

Ten years a state senator and eight years a member of Congress, Mr. Sandman was not one of your milquetoast Republicans. A resident of Cape May County, he spoke the language of rural New Jersey and he spoke it plain, in a raspy, often belligerent voice that could bristle with sarcasm and thunder with scorn. Robert Kennedy was "long-haired Bobby," draft-card burners were "treasonous," and former Gov. William Cahill, a longtime foe who was defeated by Mr. Sandman in the 1973 Republican primary, was nothing that would bear printing in a family newspaper.

The philosophy Mr. Sandman laid down in three campaigns for governor was straightforward. He was anti-abortion, anti-taxes, anti-crime, anti-big-government, anti-regional-zoning, and anti-school-busing. He was in favor of capital punishment and letting local communities do pretty much what they wanted. When he ran against Brendan Byrne in the general election of 1973, he warned that Mr. Byrne and the Democrats would "impose on our state an alien political philosophy and structure . . . allowing our state to fall into the hands of far-out leftists and wild theoreticians." Mr. Sandman lost 2-to-1 to Mr. Byrne, though his defeat had as much to do with Republican scandals in Trenton and Washington as with rejection of his philosophy. "If Abraham Lincoln had been in my place, he wouldn't have done any better," was his characteristically resilient view.

Six months later, more pugnacious than ever, he treated a nationwide television audience to the Sandman style during House Judiciary Committee impeachment hearings against President Nixon. For a time in the summer of 1974, he was one of Mr. Nixon's most visible defenders, a square-faced man with thick dark eyebrows who heaped scorn and ridicule on committee Democrats and accused them of offering no more than innuendo and circumstantial evidence. It didn't bother him that even some Republicans found his defense strident and ill-informed. "I have my disposition, and that's the only way I know how to act," he said. That fall, thanks largely to his defense of Mr. Nixon, he lost the congressional seat he had held since 1966.

So he moved on to the practice of law. "The impeachment was a disaster for me politically. But it was great from a business perspective," he said cheerfully, and he turned to rebuilding his career. When a stroke claimed him this week, he was a Superior Court judge, a job he was given by Governor Kean.

Almost everything about Mr. Sandman seemed larger than life. He had big hands and big shoulders, and he won a boxing scholarship to Temple University on the strength of highschool achievements as a middleweight Golden Gloves boxer. During World War II, after the bomber on which he was navigator was shot down over Pilsen, Czechoslovakia, he escaped from a German prison camp and made his way to Allied lines. He was a fighter, and you don't have to believe in all the things he fought for to mourn his passing.

OUR CONSTITUTION

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Mollie G. Pamplin, one of my constituents from Falls Church, VA, has written a patriotic prose selection entitled, "Our Constitution," which I would like to share with my colleagues. As we, as a nation, prepare to celebrate in 1987 the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, I hope Mrs. Pamplin's writing will cause each of us to reflect on our Constitution which has served as the foundation of our Nation for nearly 200 years.

OUR CONSTITUTION

(By Mollie G. Pamplin)

I speak for the American people,

I am the Constitution of the United States of America,

I was signed by thirty-nine men from twelve states on September 17, 1787.

My first ten amendments were ratified on December 15, 1791 and are known as the Bill of Rights. I have twenty-six amendments in all.

I have survived many momentous events. They have tested my strength and I have stood firm through them all.

Born of the American Revolution, I have lived through the War of 1812, the Civil War, the Spanish American War, World War I, World War II, the Korean Conflict and the Vietnam War.

I have seen forty Presidents, one who resigned from office, one who was appointed to office, four who were assassinated, four who had attempts made on their lives and three who died on our Independence Day. I have survived the great depression and several recessions. In good times and in bad I have stood strong.

I have given women the right to vote and guaranteed the civil rights of all citizens.

I guarantee your right to freedom of religion, to freedom of speech, freedom of the press, your right to peaceably assemble and the right to keep and bear arms.

How will you respond to your rights which I guarantee? Will you practice your religion but never press it upon others or deny them the right to practice theirs? Will you exercise your right to vote as the sacred privilege it is? Will you always be peaceable when you assemble? Will you keep and bear arms responsibly? Will you regard your right to free speech and a free press as a precious possession to be used and observed with Honor?

For more than two hundred years I have been the guardian of this Republic. Please protect me as you would your very life for I am your freedom.

GOVERNMENT EXCELLENCE

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, in these days of billion dollar spending, it is rare that we hear of even one instance where the Government has done a good job. It is even more rare to hear that the Government—whether Federal, State or local—worked efficiently or effectively. That is why, when it happens in my district, I want to let you know about it.

Recently, the Department of Agriculture selected the Troup County Parks and Recreation Commission out of all the Southeast region of the United States to make a training film using the commission's ideas and methods of administering the Summer Lunch Program. They were selected because of their overall high quality management and work.

As a little bit of history, this program has been in existence for 14 years in Troup County. But in the years since the Troup County Parks and Recreational Commission took over its service, its organization has been called the best in the Southeast.

This commission is responsible for preparing approximately 800 lunches per day and delivers them to 13 different sites around the county so that low income children will have at least one balanced meal per day. The lunches are free and are critical to the nutritional needs of these children during their summer vacation.

This program—the Summer Food Service Program—is an extension of the School Lunch Program and serves the people of Troup County in an efficient and effective manner.

I want to congratulate and commend the Troup County Parks and Recreation Commisson for doing its part to make our Government a little better.

THE LOUISVILLE REDBIRDS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of my colleagues the success of my hometown Louisville Redbirds baseball team which captured the American Association championship for the second time in a row.

The Redbirds, who are affiliated with the National League St. Louis Cardinals, moved to Louisville in 1982. Since then, A. Ray Smith, the team's owner as well as "chief cook, bottlewasher, and cheer leader," has made sure that summertime in the River City has never been so much fun.

The leadership, salesmanship, and, I should add, the showmanship of A. Ray Smith have made the Redbirds the biggest attendance draw in minor league baseball—and one of the biggest draws in all professional baseball.

Attendance the first year the Redbirds perched in Redbird stadium was 868,418. The Redbirds then set the all-time minor league attendance record of 1,052,438 in the 1983 season. While the Redbirds haven't broken their 1983 attendance record, the fans of our community—who cut their baseball eyeteeth back in the days when the Louisville Colonels, a Boston Red Sox farm club, were perennial Triple A champs—have come out in throngs to cheer their new "boys of summer."

Despite a rather shaky start, the 1985 Redbirds confounded the critics, won 12 of the last 24 games, and won the division title on the final night of the season. The Birds finished the season with a 74-68 record.

With Manager Jim Fregosi directing the action on the field, the Redbirds beat the Oklahoma 89'ers 4 games to 1 and brought the 1985 American Association pennant back to Louisville.

I speak for all citizens of our community in saying that we are all mighty proud of our Redbirds who are true winners in every sense of the word.

Hats off and a deep bow to Jim Fregosi and the team and to A. Ray Smith, Dan Ulmer, and all in the Redbirds' organization. Thanks for a great year!

HOW INSURED ARE YOUR SAVINGS?

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared in yesterday's Washington Post. The article, entitled "How Insured Are Your Savings?" by Hobart Rowen, addresses a serious problem which touches all Americans.

The subject of Mr. Rowen's column is the current system of Federal insurance for commercial and savings banks. The FDIC and FSLIC, which insure commercial institutions and thrifts respectively, are in need of reform. The safety and soundness of banks and thrift institutions is a fundamental principle upon which our banking system is based. But what about the soundness of the system that is designed to insure those institutions? As we are all aware, there have been a large number of bank and thrift failures over the last 2 years. The potential for disaster inherent in unstable banks was brought home earlier this year by the problems with State-insured institutions in Ohio and Maryland. While the Federal insurance funds are in much better shape than those two State funds, there is a lesson for us in these incidents.

While I do not endorse all of the solutions that are outlined in Mr. Rowen's article, I do think that they merit our attention. Action must be taken to strengthen the Federal deposit insurance funds. Mr. Rowen has written an important article, and those of us in Congress would do well to consider it carefully.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 12, 1985]

HOW INSURED ARE YOUR SAVINGS?

(By Hobart Rowen)

On the radio the other day, a consumer adviser told listeners to invest in insured institutions. But if you can't, the voice said, make sure that the uninsured business is being conducted on a "sound basis."

Never mind the impracticality of the advice. (How could the average investor determine whether a business operation is sound?) The revealing underlying assumption was that if an institution is insured, one needn't question whether it's sound or unsound.

In a deregulated world, that psychology is precisely what encouraged many banks and savings and loan associations, competing for the consumer dollar, to take risks they would otherwise have found unacceptable.

Now there is a time bomb ticking away: the federal deposit insurance system may not be able to cope with potential runs on these institutions. There are hundreds of sick S&Ls shored up by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. It provides depositors with federal insurance up to $100,000 in the same way that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. insures deposits at commercial banks.

On a realistic accounting basis, many S&Ls would in fact be bankrupt because of their bad investments, notably in real estate. Because the cost of covering all potential losses far exceeds the FSLIC insurance fund of less than $4 billion, regulatory officials are talking of setting up a new agency empowered to borrow as much as $20 billion in private markets to augment the FSLIC's bail-out funds.

Another possible "solution" is a merger of the FSLIC into the FDIC, which would have the practical effect of wiping out the distinction between thrifts and banks. The FDIC is in a stronger position than the FSLIC. Nonetheless, it begins to appear that a merger would be a case of the halt aiding the blind.

A revealing new book, "The Gathering Crisis in Federal Deposit Insurance," by Ohio State University Prof. Edward J. Kane, says we have been lulled into thinking the FDIC and FSLIC provide a cheap, logical way of ensuring that the corner bank or S&L will be stable—or you can get your money back.

Kane has a gift for simple metaphor that brings the problem to life. He likens the fragility of the deposit-insurance system—one of the remaining legacies of the New Deal—to an old car that hasn't been well maintained. While still adequate for "light loads in flat country, it cannot be driven endlessly up and down steep interest-rate mountains without breaking down," he says.

"There is good reason to doubt either that the old car has many more interest-rate mountains left in it, or that it can be steered unharmed through the mine field of contemporary financial services competition."

At present, some 900 of the nation's 14,700 banks are on a "problem" list. That means, according to the FDIC rating system, that they run a significant risk of failure. The FSLIC doesn't even admit that it keeps a list, acknowledging only that 73 S&Ls disappeared last year, while 672 vanished in 1982 and 1983. The last time I mentioned these numbers, an FSLIC official protested to The Post that the public was being unnecessarily frightened by exaggerations.

Writes Kane: "The point that authorities don't want to face is that, however well the deposit-insurance system may have run in the past, it is headed for a bureaucratic breakdown. . . . Unless market discipline is reimposed on deposit institution risk-taking, the deposit-insurance bureaucracy will seize up at a most inopportune time."

Kane argues for dramatic changes—"trading in" the old deposit insurance "jalopy" before it cracks up with its passengers aboard. His "new model" would be one with reduced coverages and increased fees designed to force managers to make safer investments. He would gradually lower the basic insurance limit to $10,000 (then index it for inflation). Larger balances, in successive $10,000 slices, would be available at an increased insurance cost, to be paid for by the institutions or the depositors.

He believes Congress made a big mistake in 1980 when it boosted the insured account limit to $100,000. That was much more than the average householder needed, but in effect it enabled the banks to issue federally guaranteed debt that was in many ways superior to Treasury debt.

To be sure, a congressional resolution has reaffirmed that "the full faith and credit" of the federal government is behind the FDIC and FSLIC. That may guarantee savers against long-term losses, while the taxpayers pick up the check. But the resolution doesn't say just how it would work, or ensure that there won't be some panic while Congress acts to fulfill its promise.

Kane's proposals may be difficult for politicians to swallow. But his diagnosis of the problem rings true, and he makes a compelling case that the existing insurance system has been pushed beyond its capacity.

COMMODORE JOHN BARRY DAY 1985

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the bipartisan 112-member Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs, I am pleased to join with the Ancient Order of Hibernians in commemorating a great Irish-American, Commodore John Barry. Under article XXIV of the constitution of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, today has been designated as "Commodore John Barry Day" in honor of the father of the American Navy.

While today we honor one distinguished Irish-American for his unique contributions to America—we are in fact honoring the entire Irish-American community for their countless contributions over our Nation's history.

John Barry was born in 1745 in County Wexford in Ireland. John Barry, as would be expected of someone affiliated with the Navy, took a love of the sea at the young age of 10. At the age of 30, he was commissioned as a captain in the Continental Navy of our Original Colonies. In fighting his adopted nation's Revolutionary War at sea, Commodore Barry defeated the British tender, the Edward, thus bringing to an American port, its first prize.

John Barry made invaluable contributions to America's successful quest for independence. Most noteworthy among his accomplishments was during the time when he commanded the frigate Alliance to victory in the last sea battle of the Revolutionary War. In 1793, George Washington called upon Barry to serve as the new U.S. Navy's first commissioned officer, thus earning him the honor we commemorate today—the father of the American Navy.

Irish-American organizations have been successful in achieving greater recognition for Commodore John Barry and other Irish-Americans who have made our Nation great. The Ancient Order of Hibernians is justifiably proud of the role it played in the 1981 law passed by Congress and signed by President Reagan honoring John Barry as the father of the American Navy.

On September 13, 1985, there are several noted ceremonies scheduled. One is at Constitution Park in Philadelphia, where Secretary of the Navy John Lehman will lay a wreath at the Barry statue there. Here in Washington, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations Thomas J. Hughes will join the AOH Commodore Barry Division of Washington, DC, in a noon wreath-laying ceremony.

I am proud to join in marking this important occasion honoring this important figure in American history. Let me also pay special tribute to two individuals with the Ancient Order of Hibernians who work to make Commodore Barry Day the important occasion it is. The first is the national president of the AOH, Joseph Roche; the second is Frank Duggan, who leads the Washington, DC, chapter of the AQH, and who gives hours of effort to the Barry Day celebration.

AN END TO APARTHEID

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1985

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I think it's time for the United States to speak with one voice on South Africa. It's easy to stand up and say you're opposed to apartheid. We all are. But it's not so easy to stop apartheid overnight.

The Government of South Africa has made some progress in stopping apartheid. For example, black trade unions are increasing, giving blacks more power to bargain to get fair wages and improved working conditions. An all-white electorate overwhelmingly approved a new South African Constitution giving more political power to other races, including the establishment of a multiracial, tricameral Parliament.

And, just in the past few days, the Botha government has made several new proposals. President Botha has offered to extend citizenship to all blacks. Additionally, it has been proposed to end the repugnant pass laws that require blacks to carry passes to travel around South Africa.

It should also be noted that the black share of national income in South Africa is nearly 50 percent. Black South Africans already constitute the largest black middle class in Africa.

So there has been progress. Clearly, it's not enough, but it is a step in the right direction. The debate within South Africa is no longer whether or not to end apartheid, but how soon and what should be done at what time.

What the U.S. Government should be doing is supporting evolution to prevent a revolution in South Africa. Congress cannot change the laws of South Africa. We've tried before with other countries and failed miserably. Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Angola, and Nicaragua are now all in the Communist or Marxist camp. And, in the case of Iran, our demand for reform led the country into the hands of an extreme religious fanatic.

The measures we adopt about South Africa should express our repugnance with apartheid, but not attempt to topple the South African Government. A strong, growing economy is more helpful to South African blacks than putting a stranglehold on their economy.

I believe the President's Executive order is the right step for the United States to take. But, the Executive order does not have to be the end if progress in South Africa to end apartheid is not continued. Congress can still enact H.R. 1460, the South African Anti-Apartheid Act, at a later date. Or, Congress could also come up with a totally new bill to respond to the quickly changing conditions in South Africa.

But the Executive order is our chance to act and to act now. Even the leader of the 6-million member Zulu nation, the largest racial group in South Africa, said: "* * * of all the possible types of economic sanctions which could be applied to South Africa, the sanctions announced by President Reagan probably rank among the most responsible that a Western head of state could push for."

We shouldn't pass up this opportunity to speak with one voice on South Africa. President Botha was at least right about one thing when he said that South Africa had become the victim of an internal political dispute over who could impose the toughest sanctions. Let's end this dispute and give the Executive order the chance to work.

SENATE—Monday, September 16, 1985

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

*Praise ye the Lord. Praise, O ye servants of the Lord, praise the name of the Lord. Blessed be the name of the Lord from this time forth and for evermore. From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the Lord's name is to be praised. The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens. Who is like unto the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high * * .— Psalm 113:1-5.

God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, on this first day of the Jewish New Year, we remember with profound gratitude the legacy left us by the Old Testament people of God: the Bible, monotheism, absolute morality in the Ten Commandments, and the messianic hope which guarantees that history is not capricious, but orderly, purposeful, meaningful. History is moving toward a glorious, cosmic consummation. Thank Thee for Jewish values which are a significant part of the foundation upon which our Nation is built. Give us to see, Lord, that we disregard these values to our national peril. As Thou didst call our Nation into existence, grant that we will fulfill its destiny in history to Thy glory. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, once again, we have heard a most appropriate prayer from our Chaplain, in view of the significance of this very holy day, the Jewish holiday Rosh Hashanah. As always, his prayers are most appropriate to the needs and exigencies of the day. It was beautifully said.

SCHEDULE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there will be time for the two leaders under the standing order of 10 minutes each and a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

There will be routine morning business, not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1200, the immigration bill. I remind my colleagues that there will be no rollcall votes today during this session due to the Jewish holiday Rosh Hashanah.

At the present time, let me share with my colleagues and with the Democratic leader that we do have an amendment pending at the desk. There are various other amendments. We are presently going to "shop"—I believe that is the phrase we use here—for an agreement that would call for rollcall votes on amendments to begin at 10 a.m. tomorrow, Tuesday, the 17th, with 5 minutes of debate equally divided to precede each vote, and provisions that there be no amendments to amendments that are considered today or were considered Friday for disposition on Tuesday or that might be handled tomorrow.

As other amendments are offered which would require a rollcall vote, there would be a separate agreement entered into whereby we would try to sequence those votes after the other votes, with the same 5 minutes of debate provided for before the amendment is voted upon. It is hoped that we might reach such an agreement. We have done that before on this vexing issue, and the majority leader and the minority leader had worked toward that before I came to this particular post.

I deeply appreciate the efforts of the Democratic leader, who has been most supportive of the legislation in each instance, to see if we could reach that type of arrangement whereby we would stack those votes. As I say, we have done that in the past on this legislation.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] will be the minority floor manager today, and we will deal with his amendments.

I encourage the Members who are within range of the Senate to come forward with their amendments today. This is the pending item of business. We will be here to process those amendments. Some amendments have been scheduled previously.

We have one or two amendments which in my definition would be nongermane, but that is not for me to determine, since there is no time agreement or other restriction here. It is hoped that we can deal with those without a great deal of delay and difficulty.

I hope we can resolve the activities of Senator HEINZ and Senator BUMPERS with regard to a Social Security amendment.
